OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Secretary Cushing's Views of the Courtesy Due to Mr. French, who was Bobbing Around all day and not at Home.

The excitement consequent upon the detention of the steamer Northern Light caused a good deal of talking. It was natural on Christmas day that people should have more about their home affairs than usual, the causes of bad luck of any description notwithstanding. The rain, moreover, tended to prevent any from straying out, either compelled by legal process, or under sentimental engagements. In the morning, however, Mr. Commissioner HAYMAN was early at his office. Messrs. CORNELIUS VAN-COTT and J. S. WEEKS appeared also, and gave bail in the sum of $20,000 for the steamer Northern Light. The steamer will then formally release by the United States District Attorney, Mr. McKEON, from the libel executed the day previous. Captain TOUSSAINTON and Mr. PEYSON, the chief Engineer, were further held to bail, the former in the sum of $20,000, and the latter for $10,000. Jonathan L. WHITE, Esq., was accepted as security in both cases. Warrants of arrest were issued against PARKER H. FRENCH, the Nicaraguan Minister, GEORGE E. HAIN, Lewis COMPTON, T. B. FARNSWORTH, Dumont, and Hallett, charged with setting on foot a military expedition against the State of Nicaragua, with whom the United States are at peace. The steamer Northern Light still remains where she was first anchored, off pier No. 3, North River. At certainly hour in the morning, between 1 and 2 A. M., some two hundred of the steerage passengers, not having tickets, were put ashore. During the day, under the direction and supervision of the Assistant District-Attorney, Mr. JOACHIMSSEN, the remaining passengers were subjected to a similar constitutional examination of the cargo is postponed for one day. Other than the official visit of the Assistant District-Attorney, and a new levy of United States Marshals to take charge, no parties visited the steamer. Meanwhile the revenue cutter Washington and the Fleet held their posts of guard. These are the only new developments in this case thus far.

We give the proceedings at the Marshal's Office full—in the words of one of our Law Reporters:

United States Marshal's and Commissioner's Office.

Yesterday morning the quietude of Mr. Commissioner HAYMAN's rural retreat at Hoboken was invaded by a mandate to attend at his office to take bail for some of the parties directed the previous evening by the orders of the President of the United States, for an alleged breach of the neutrality laws. Gustavus Vanderbilt and Joseph L. White, Esqs., attended by their Counsel, Horace T. Clarke, Esq., were in attendance to give security for the steamship Northern Light, which vessel had been libelled by Mr. John McKEON, United States District-Attorney, on the part of the Government, for the breach of the neutrality laws. The vessel was seized by the Marshal, and was formally released, and the vessel was formally released.

The next case was that of Captain Edward THRELKELDER, the master of the Northern Light, who is charged with resisting the officers of the United States while they were in the course of executing a search warrant. The bail was fixed at $20,000. Capt. T. and Joseph L. White were accepted as sureties.

The next case was that of the United States vs. Gilbert Sanders. This gentleman was the engineer of the ship, and was also charged with a similar offence as the Captain. He gave bail in the sum of $10,000, Mr. J. White becoming his surety.

The United States vs. John Creighton and A. Morrison.—These parties are committed as witnesses.

The United States vs. Parker H. French, ——, Dillingham, ——, Mallory, George E. Hare and ——, Tamworth, Louis Schlesinger.—These defendants are charged, on the oath of William H. Allen, of No. 50 Woodhull-street, Brooklyn, "with setting on foot, preparing and providing the means for a military expedition or enterprise, to be carried on from thence against the Territory of the State of Nicaragua, with whom the United States are at peace. The complaint also states, that this was done within the State of New-York, and within the Southern District, and on or about the 20th of December, inst. The affidavit was sworn to before George W. Morton, Esq., U. S. C., and who, thereupon, issued his warrant, directed to Abm. T. Hilyer, Esq., U. S. Marshal, &c., &c., for the arrest of the defendants.

The United States vs. George E. Hall.—This defendant is charged with a breach of the neutrality laws of the United States, and remains in the custody of the Marshal.

On Board the Steamer.

One of our reporters who remained upon the steamer Northern Light all night of Monday, compliments of having had rather a tough time of it. The Northerner rolled rather lightly over the waves, and, with the general hustle of the United States officials recently placed in command, and the large crowd of passengers thronging every nook and crevice of the vessel, and no fire that was accessible, and no opportunity or place to lay a head, he found his night at sea an experience, all in all, he does not care to have soon repeated. A few shivering chances, however, attendant upon the genuine discomfort of the occasion, served as a pleasant compensation. When his associate reporter left, at shortly after midnight, all was very quiet, no excitement in the cabin of Tuesday morning's report. Very soon after, among the steerage passengers, discontent began to show itself. A large number had no cash or their banks, nor vest, for that matter. As the wind grew colder, they sickened evidently of their adventuring projects, and began to express a desire to be on shore. This is not to be wondered at, when it is remembered that a major part were merely youths, from fourteen to twenty years of age. A good share, furthermore, from frequent and copious quaffs of bad liquor, with a bottle of which every third man had supplied himself, by this time began to feel the effects of this imbibition. At length their determination to be let go ashore began to be so persistent that Captain FAUNCE, of the revenue cutter Washington, who was placed in command of the steamer, dispatched Mr. HAYMAN, the Purser of the Northern Light, to the residence of Mr. McKEON, the District-Attorney, in West Thirty-seventh street. This officer conferred with the District-Attorney, and returned with instructions to permit to leave the vessel any person on board not having a passage ticket, but not to allow any baggage to be removed to the shore. A memorandum was desired, however, to be made of the names and places of residence of the parties allowed to leave under such order. Upon receiving this order, Captain FAUNCE directed that all the steerage passengers on board be mustered at the gangway. To effect this required some time, and, from the contrariety and inebriate condition of many of these passengers, furnished good work for all the Marshals. When finally effected, each party in turn were summoned forward and demanded to show their tickets. Those presenting their tickets were placed above the steamer, while the others were ranged on one side of the gangway. Meanwhile, upon suggestion of Lieutenant STANROOM, a small boat was lowered, and a messenger dispatched to the Washington to bring a supply of pistols for the officers in case any decided opposition should occur in the course of the removal from the steamer of those who were to be put ashore. The steamship Purbeck, which was lying alongside of the cutter Washington, was ordered to be brought near to the Northern Light, when the removal began in a small boat of the steerage un-ticketed passengers. The officers of the Washington, together with the Deputy Marshals, were formed in a line leading to the steps by the gangway over the side. The scene now for some time beggars further description. It was a mixture of the ludicrous and the serious. Although most had previously expressed their urgent desire to be put ashore, some were determined not to acquiesce in such arrangement.

"I won't go ashore, no way," said one; "I was told to come here and my passage would be paid to Nicaragua, and that I should have 200 acres of land when I arrived there. I have come to go, and insist on going."

"Never mind, this time," urged the exceedingly courteous Captain FAUNCE; "next hitch, perhaps, you will have better luck."

As far as he was individually concerned, those who wished to go to Nicaragua, or to any other place, would have his consent; but he had been authorized not only to allow those not having tickets to go ashore, but to put all such ashore. These instructions he must obey.

"Instructions—instructions—the devil," struck in another; "no one has thought to stop a lot of fellows who desire to emigrate peacefully."

"D—n the vessel," added a third; "it's a sinking concern, and the sooner we leave it the better."

Some, too drunk to articulate their ideas straight forward, hiccuped out their opposition or willingness to go, according as the caprice took them. By ingeniously chiming in with the various whims of the divers parties he had to deal with, at one time joking and at another showing decisive earnestness, Captain FAUNCE at length succeeded in removing to the attending tug the entire party, in all 170, with the exception of two. These—JOHN CASTANSON and J. J. MOSMSON, both of New-York, and formerly attached to the Custom-House, persisted that they would not be put ashore anyhow. Captain FAUNCE accordingly ordered that they be placed in irons. They were fastened to the wheel of the wheel-house, and, from their uncomfortable position, having to stand up, speedily regretted that they had not yielded to the commands of the Captain. The residue, who were placed aboard the steamtug, were landed at the foot of Pier No. 4. It was nearly 8 o'clock when the steam-tug bore the party away. Their yells and songs bordered on the terrific, and must have been heard at a great distance.

The job ended, the Northern Light presented a comparatively deserted appearance. Quiet now prevailed—the Marshals slackened the celerity and watchfulness of their movements. The officers betook themselves to their staterooms, and those who could find corners to retreat to, availed themselves of the same. Nothing intervened to interrupt the quietness during the forenoon.

CABIN PASSENGERS OVERHAULED.

At 2 o'clock Mr. JOACHIMSSEN, the Assistant United States District-Attorney, came on board and presented Captain FAUNCE the following letter of instructions from the District-Attorney relative to the search of the vessel:

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW-YORK, U. S. DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S OFFICE, Dec. 25, 1855.

CAPTAIN FAUNCE, U. S. Revenue Cutter Washington:

SIR: You will please to proceed to an examination of the cargo of the Northern Light, and report to me a detailed statement of her lading, but examination to be made carefully and in the presence of the parties interested, and to be compared with the manifest. You will, if necessary, call on the Fleet for additional assistance. You will, also, muster all the persons on board, whether passengers or otherwise, and report the same to me. None of the persons on board are to be allowed to leave the ship until further advice. Very respectfully,

JOHN McKEON, U. S. District-Attorney.

Before making the search of the vessel, it was agreed by the authorities to overhaul the cabin passengers, for fear that some of the unticketed still remained on board. This occupied some two or three hours. They turned up all the baggage and looked into all the rat-holes, and found some twenty of the delinquents. These poor shivering fellows were put to the rack—speaking metaphorically. They said that Mr. SCOTT (the Agent of the Transit Company) had engaged them to go to Nicaragua to build piers, lay stone walls, and the like, and had told them that their passage would be paid after getting on board and clear of the wharf. Judas Apollo, and the officers, too, believed their story.

Mr. SCOTT was on board. He owned up. He moreover agreed to pay their fare, and begged that they might be retained on board. Agreed to.

It was getting dark. They ached to overhaul the cargo, but on consultation concluded to wait till to-day.

STARTLING RUMOR.

There were on board four boxes in care of WINANS & Co.'s Express, say 7 by 2 feet. On tipping them up it was found that these boxes were terribly heavy. The rumor grew that they contained munitions of war—pistols, cannons, or something of that sort. Mr. WINANS was on the spot. He cordially invited the officials to take a look into them, but feeling that they might possibly contain an infernal machine, they thought they would not.

SCOTT ARRESTED.

Mr. JOACHIMSSEN about this time very politely arrested Mr. SCOTT. Mr. SCOTT protested and wanted to see the papers for the proceeding. He was instantly gratified. Mr. SCOTT assured Mr. J. and all his friends that he was Agent not for Colonel, General or President WALKER, but for the Transit Company; that he had engaged men to go to Nicaragua before now,—for instance, 30 men by the Star of the West on her last trip. For that matter he remarked that the Colonel (W.) had more men now on his hands than he could feed.

Mr. J. assured him that what he said was very interesting, but he must remind him that he was not compelled to criminate himself.

"As you please," responded the agent.

When the party came on shore, Mr. S. was permitted to leave on his parole of honor to appear at 10 o'clock to-day at the District-Attorney's Office.

AN EDITOR ARRESTED.

Mr. J. having his hand in, went on to arrest another gentleman, to wit: an editor, Mr. MALE, of El Nicaraguense. Mr. Editor protested, too.

AN EDITOR ARRESTED.

Mr. J. next arrested Mr. CHARLES LESTER, (who was on the bills of the Broadway Theatre, to appear on the evening of the 24th.) Mr. L. was one of the cabin passengers. He protested burlesquely against arrests at all times and seasons. But, with a smile, he was placed in charge of a marshal.

OTHER ARRESTS.

During the day warrants were issued for the arrest of ADDISON FARNSWORTH, (presumed Captain of the Regiment forming for the aid of WALKER,) Col. GEO. B. HALL, (son of Mayor HALL, of Brooklyn.) Both of these gentlemen have been attached to the Custom-House, and were volunteers in the Mexican War.

Before leaving the steamer, Mr. JOACHIMSSEN left as a token, with Captain FAUNCE, the following INSTRUCTIONS.

ON BOARD THE STEAMSHIP NORTHERN LIGHT, Dec. 25, 1855.

CAPTAIN FAUNCE: The following persons are required to be sent to the office of the United States District-Attorney for examination at 10 A. M. to-morrow:

CHARLES A. BERRY, J. N. SCOTT, F. B. O'KEEFE, M. WALTER, Dr. GIBBS, M. FRENCH.

On examining the cargo, you will require in the first place the Captain's sworn outward manifest, of which no copy seems to be on board, next the shippers' manifest. You will require the shippers of the cargo to be present at the examination. You will break no Custom-House seal unless a Deputy Collector or Inspector be in attendance to unseal the packages. I will request the Collector of the Port to send a duly authorized person at as early an hour as may be convenient to him. You will report to Mr. McKEON any variation from the manifest. You will examine under the coal for concealed ordnance. You will send MALE & ESTRAN to the District Attorney's Office, in custody, at 10 A. M. to-morrow. Any cabin passengers or steerage passengers, whose name appears on the list taken by me, and who can produce his passage ticket, may be allowed to leave the ship, but no baggage can be taken, except necessary wearing apparel. Respectfully yours,

R. J. JOACHIMSSEN, Deputy District Att'y.

NO MANIFEST.

The manifest of the steamer has never been seen yet by the Marshals. Capt. THRELKELDER came on board about 4 o'clock. He was not able to produce the manifest. Being invited so to do, he referred inquirers to the Clerk. The Clerk showed a handsome one of the Express freights, but produced no clearance from the Custom-house. This was one of the reasons why the examination of the cargo was deferred.

The steamship was at anchor in the North River when we went to press, with the U. S. steamer Fleet and cutter Washington at anchor near by.

THE MARSHAL RYER'S AFFIDAVIT.

Following is the affidavit of Marshal RYER, on which warrants were issued for the arrest of Capt. THRELKELDER and his first Engineer.

Southern District of New-York, ss: BENJAMIN F. RYER being duly sworn says, that he was specially deputized by the United States Marshal for the Southern District of New-York, on the 24th day of December, instant, to execute in this District a warrant of arrest, issuing out of and under the seal of the United States District Court for this District in favor of the United States of America, against the steamer Northern Light, her tackle, apparel, furniture, arms and munitions of war on board thereof. That in pursuance of the said process, this deponent proceeded to Pier No. 3, in the City of New-York, where the said steamship was lying moored to her wharf, and took possession of the said steamer; that he handed to the Captain of the said steamer a notice in due form of law notifying him of the seizure, and also verbally told him of his acting as the Deputy Marshal, for serving said process; deponent also told the said Engineer of the same fact, and this deponent says that Edward THRELKELDER, Captain of said steamship, and —— Fowler, the Engineer of said steamship, did knowingly and wilfully obstruct, resist and oppose this deponent in executing the said process, and further he says not.

BENJAMIN F. RYER.

Sworn to before me, Dec. 25, 1855.

Official Correspondence.

The District-Attorney received last night a couple of letters from Secretary CUSHING, which turn a blue-light upon Mr. PARKER FRENCH's claims upon the courtesy of our people on the grounds of his Plenipotential character.

MR. CUSHING TO ATTORNEY M'KEON.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Monday, Dec. 24, 1855.

SIR: I duly received your communication of the 22d inst., and the document accompanying the same, having reference to the engagement and preparation of persons in the State of New-York for military service in the State of Nicaragua.

You will have received my dispatch by telegraph, notifying you of the order given by the President to Capt. BIDDLOW, of the United States Navy, to proceed according to your advice in the detention of any vessel whatsoever, implicated in proceedings contrary either to statute or to treaty stipulations, and desiring you to act in the premises upon all proper information.

If there shall have been occasion to act on the brief order sent to Capt. BIDDLOW by telegraph, or there should be good reason to suppose that there will be occasion so to do in the sequel, order to the same effect, and in more complete form, will be transmitted by mail.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

C. CUSHING.

JOHN McKEON, Esq., United States District-Attorney, New-York.

COL. FRENCH NOT MUCH OF A PLENIPOTENTIARY—NOW FAR TO BE COURTEOUS.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE, Dec. 24, 1855.

SIR: By your communication of the 22d inst., to which a general reply has been made in a previous letter of this date, it appears that Col. PARKER H. FRENCH is concerned in the engagement at New-York of persons and forms for transportation to Nicaragua. I reply especially on that point.

Col. FRENCH, by letter of the 8th inst., communicated to the Secretary of State a copy of his credentials as a Plenipotentiary of that Republic to the United States, and requested an interview preparatory to the formal presentation of said credentials to the President.

To this the Secretary of State replied, by letter of the 21st inst., stating that the President does not yet see cause to establish diplomatic intercourse with the persons claiming at this time to exercise political power in the State of Nicaragua; and that, for sufficient reasons assigned, he does not at present deem it proper to receive any one as a Minister to this Government duly appointed by that republic.

Copies of those two letters are herewith inclosed.

You will thus perceive that Col. FRENCH is entitled to diplomatic privilege in the United States only in a very qualified degree. He is not an accredited Minister, but simply a person coming to this country to present himself as such, and not received, by reason of its failing to appear that he represents any lawful Government.

Under such circumstances, any diplomatic privilege accorded to him is of mere transit, and of courtesy, not of right; and that courtesy will be withdrawn from him so soon as there shall be cause to believe that he is engaged in here, or contemplates, any act not consistent with the laws, the peace, or the public honor of the United States.

The President entertains all possible regard for the diplomatic character, by whomsoever borne; but he cannot allow it to be made a cloak for the infringement of our laws or of our international obligations. He therefore desires you to make distinctly known to the principal party the precise relations of the case, and to communicate the same to all other parties concerned, in such manner as you may find to best comport with the public interests.

I have the honor to be, Very respectfully,

C. CUSHING.

J. McKEON, Esq., U. S. District Attorney, New-York.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN COL. FRENCH AND MR. MARCY.

WASHINGTON CITY, Wednesday, Dec. 19, 1855.

Hon. WM. L. MARCY, Secretary of State of the United States of America:

SIR: I have in my possession credentials from the Supreme Government of Nicaragua, appointing me as the Minister of that Republic near the government at Washington, and accompanying this you will please find an autograph letter from the President of Nicaragua to the President of the United States of America. The object of this note is to request an interview with your Excellency before laying my credentials before your government, and in granting it at an early hour, I have no hesitation in saying that you are advancing the best interests of our respective countries. I am, Sir, with respectful consideration, your obedient servant,

PARKER H. FRENCH.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, WASHINGTON, Dec. 21, 1855.

To PARKER H. FRENCH, Esq., Washington:

SIR: Your letter to me of the 19th inst., with the inclosed copy of "an autograph letter from the President of Nicaragua to the President of the United States of America," has been received and laid before the President. I am directed by him to reply to your communication, that he has not yet seen reasons for establishing diplomatic intercourse with the persons who now claim to exercise the political power in the State of Nicaragua.

Those who were chiefly instrumental in suspending or overthrowing the former Government of that State, were not citizens belonging to it, nor have those citizens, or any considerable part of them, so far as is now known here, freely expressed their approval of, or acquiescence in the present condition of political affairs in Nicaragua. Until such shall be the case, the President does not deem it proper to receive you, or any one, as a Minister to this Government duly appointed by the supreme Government of Nicaragua.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

WM. L. MARCY.

The Affair of Allen and Farnsworth.

About 1 o'clock last Saturday afternoon, Mr. W. H. ALLEN, bridge builder, of No. 50 Woodhull-street, South Brooklyn, called at the Police Court, City Hall, over which Justice SMITH presides, and demanded a warrant for the arrest of ADDISON FARNSWORTH. He stated to the Justice that he had been connected with the raising of a body of men for Nicaragua, and had charge of Central Hall, New-York, where their meetings were held; that a meeting was appointed for Saturday night, but during the day, ascertaining that the organization was an illegal one, and not wishing to violate the laws of his country, he made up his mind to withdraw, and in accordance with this resolution failed to open the Hall that evening, as was expected of him; that about 1 o'clock the same night Mr. FARNSWORTH, with one other person, came to his house and demanded admission. Having retired to rest, he asked the name, and when made known to him that Mr. FARNSWORTH was there, he dressed himself, went to the front door and invited Mr. F. into the house, which invitation was accepted. After a conversation, apparently the most friendly, FARNSWORTH suddenly speaks up and says: "ALLEN, I believe you intend to betray us, and I have come here to kill you," and instantly drew a large bowie knife and struck towards ALLEN, who struck up the arm of F., thereby warding the blow and succeeded in inducing his visitor as a man not to attempt murder, and with nothing at all to defend himself. This caused Mr. F. to hesitate, and he finally consented that ALLEN should go to the kitchen and procure a carving knife. He proceeded to the basement, but made no effort to get a knife, but slipped out of the basement and went for the police. The assistance of two policemen was obtained, but on returning to the house his antagonist was not to be found. The warrant was issued upon the complaint with a dangerous weapon, with intent to kill, and placed in the hands of an officer to execute. ALLEN informed the officer that Mr. F. could be found at No. 5 Beaver-street, New-York, to which place he proceeded, and passed the afternoon in a fruitless search, as it appears Mr. ALLEN intended to have said No. 5 Broad-street instead of Beaver. Shortly after the warrant was issued, Mr. ALLEN was accompanied by U. S. District-Attorney McKEON, who requested, that in case FARNSWORTH was arrested that he might be retained until he could be communicated with, as he had a complaint to make against him.

Mr. French Bobbing Around.

Mr. FRENCH was very busy all day yesterday—very busy, for he wasn't at home at all, not even to reporters. He was out dining. He was up the river. He was down on Staten-Island. He was visiting the institutions. He was at a friend's. He was visiting watches. He was—not to be seen. We saw a sharp reporter from a neighboring journal holding up the button a one-armed man who sells candles in Church-street,—and whom he assured us was PARKER H. FRENCH. The indefatigable reporter took short-hand notes of the conversation, though he didn't see the little one-armed man wink as he thought how he was selling the stenographer. But the true and honest Minister Plenipotentiary was quite invisible.

He is, by the way, a small, handsome man, wears a goatee, is quiet and dignified in his address, polite, affable and gentlemanly. He lacks one arm—consequently can't take up arms as a filibuster, and hence ought not to be arrested.

FROM WASHINGTON.

Special Correspondence of the N. Y. Daily Times.

WASHINGTON, Monday, Dec. 24, 1855.

A COLD SCENT.

The most experienced politicians are at fault with regard to the speakership. The whole matter is at a dead lock,—and nobody pretends to have the key. Only one thing seems certain,—and that is that from ninety to one hundred men are firmly resolved never to abandon the support of Mr. BANKS, come what may. Two weeks ago some of these were disposed to drop him and try a new candidate. But every hour adds strength to the conviction that to yield Mr. BANKS is to concede the defeat of the Anti-Nebraska Party, and yield the victory to the traitors who, elected as Anti-Nebraska men, are relentlessly pressing their efforts to revive "National Know-Nothingism," and making it an element to divide the North in the next Presidential campaign.

MR. BANKS' STANDING THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

This conviction is supported, too, by hundreds of letters and telegraphic dispatches, daily received by members of the House, from all parts of the country, and from gentlemen who have been prominent in both the old parties, all concurring in the advice to "stand fast" upon Mr. BANKS, even though the organization should never be effected. Even those gentlemen who voted for Mr. BANKS, a fortnight ago, simply because their party friends did so, and without either wishing or expecting his election, now feel the moral necessity pressing upon them with overwhelming force, and are as determined as the most resolute of the Massachusetts Delegation.

DETERMINATION OF THE ANTI-NEBRASKA MEN.

Nor is this persistence to be properly designated as either factious or unwise; because the great majority of the Anti-Nebraska men feel entirely satisfied that they can now concentrate on no man so large a vote as they have given Mr. BANKS. Once scattered by diversion in favor of a new candidate, and it is their opinion that it would be impossible to rally again so strongly, even in behalf of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Under these circumstances, there seems to be no alternative but to "camp down" and fight on for the candidate already selected until he or somebody else is elected, even though the entire new year be exhausted. This is the evident determination; and the Administration may as well take due notice thereof, and govern itself accordingly. When it wants appropriations, or is satisfied that the President's message is becoming a little stale, it will probably find means to organize the House. The Anti-Administration men can afford to wait quite as long as their opponents.

THE SYSTEM OF "PAIRING OFF."

It is to be regretted that a few of our own men think it proper to "pair off" with their opponents, and thus deprive us of the benefit of the absenteeism on the other side. At such a time as the present, there can scarcely be good excuse either for this, or for members absenting themselves from the city. They have clearly no right to go away during the session, and, except in extreme cases, are not excusable under circumstances which render it possible that their presence may be needed for the proper fulfilment of the business confided to them by their constituents. Stand to your guns, gentlemen, at least until this first fight is over.

DEARTH OF NEWS.

There is scarcely an item of news here at present,—everything is waiting for the organization. The Senate has adjourned until Thursday, and will do nothing this week. Next week it will probably attempt to make a Speaker; and then we shall have a little music. Until then, I fear we must be content with the incessant snapping and cracking of the fireworks with which the boys in this city celebrate the advent of Christmas, as we have auricular evidence while I write.

SENATOR TOUCEY FOR THE LONDON MISSION.

I am assured that Senator TOUCEY has been thought of by the President for the London Mission, and that it is still not certain but he will be appointed,—in which event I take it for granted Mr. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut, will return from St. Petersburg, and leave that mission open for some other political favorite who has not given his receipt for payment of services rendered. I learn also that the London Mission has been tendered to Ex-Governor SEYMOUR of New-York, and that he has not yet yielded to the pressing solicitations of the President that he should accept the place. I confess I do not exactly understand either why the tender should be made to Mr. SEYMOUR, or, if made, why he should decline it. B.

From Under Saint Paul's—An Hour's Watching of the Broadway Tide.

Let us stand here awhile, in the shadow of Saint Paul's, and near the monumental marble erected to the memory of the first great martyr of the Revolution. The tomb of MONTGOMERY chronicles the birth of the Republic; the sense before us records its growth.

See what a world of humanity is passing and repassing; what throngs, busy and active, agitated with the day's importance,—for every day is important to a freeman; what cavalcades of public vehicles and private carriages burnish the pavement until it is slippery with the polish of use; what wagons of merchandise, representing all the nationalities and products of the old and new worlds, their drivers warned into impatience at the crowd that appals their sagacity, come in contact and stop in the throng, as though before the shrine of Liberty by which we are standing. Here we have silk from the Indies, shawls from Cashmere, furs from Greenland and every hunting-ground on the earth; lace from Limerick and Flanders, watches from Geneva, pipes from Deutchland and Turkey, cigars from Cuba, fashions from France, toys from Switzerland, woolens from the West of England, linens from Ireland, glass from Bohemia, cotton from the Southern, wheat from the Northern, pork from the Western, and "notions" from the Eastern States of the Union. Every nation has its ambassador in the labor of its artisans and artists here; and all are appreciated and rivaled by our own genius. The scene before us actively and vividly portrays an exposition of industry. It is the Labor Congress of the earth. It is truly and emphatically a World's Fair, which the nations, like so many workshops, have felt it of vital importance to contribute to, and which the commercial and progressive spirit of our land has felt equally proud to convene.

Not alone in commodities are the nations and States memorable before us, but also in lumanities of every type and shade. People from every country of the world have meet upon a common ground, and under the one blue sky, like the stars upon the flag of the Republic. What strangely featured and variously costumed groups make up the picture. See yon pair of Chinese with blue linen pantaloons fitting close to the leg from hip to ankle, a loose jerkin of the same material and color encasing the trunks and arms of the Celestials, whose toes are turned up as if in wonderment at the new scenes, and whose faces are of a sickly sallow, like half-drawn tea; there they go, stalking along with a wondering chain of boys after them, certainly not less lengthy than the tails from which form the subject of their juvenile amaze and merriment. Their coming withdraws for a moment the attraction of the knot of idlers congregated around those Indian women opposite, who, in large blankets, broad-rimmed hats and a profusion of necklaces and gaudy-colored wrappers, are silently exposing for sale, moccasins and tobacco pouches radiant with beaded labor of quaint design and rainbow colors. Here we have a profusely bearded German, with a short-waisted coat and a long-stemmed pipe. He walks leisurely and is thoughtful. He evidently argues with himself if this is not his fatherland, for the words of one of his own Teuton bards suggest new conclusions to his brain as though it ran the lines—

"This is the land, the land of lands,
Where vows bind less than clasped hands;
Where valor lights the flashing eye,
Where love and truth in deep hearts lie,
And not unlikelies Freedom's birth!
That is the German's fatherland."

There is a very striking contrast in a dapper Frenchman, with a good-looking happy face, and effectively arranged moustache, the right side of which seems to lean upon the cigar, while the left acts like a comb upon the smoky ringlets which incessantly curl from his mouth.

Here, beside us, is a rather fussy lady, with a small portmanteau and parasol in one hand, a small basket and hand-box in the other, and a couple of children holding on by her shawl, as she, somewhat satisfactorily, perceives by the bills nailed to the tree, that the North River boat starts "precisely at 5." And look at those boys, whose habiliments seem to partake of the national character for adaptability in fitting frames only one-half the tailor's intention; these very little boys with very loud voices—the human telegraphs of rising and falling stocks in the foreign markets—dive through the crowd like eels in mud, shouting all the while, the arrival of a European steamer and the EVENING TIMES. These newsboys make quite a commotion, but there is a figure who seems lost to their importance—he is as fixed and as silent as the marble he is gazing on, and almost as pale—for he has come upon it suddenly. You can see that he almost becomes a part of the stone from which he is reading. He has done. A tremulous flush wipes off his pallor; a long-drawn sigh and a tear issue from his heart and eye simultaneously, and he passes on, chaotic grief, joys and hopes showing their traces on his expressively mobile face. He is lost in the crowd. Men do not live nor die in vain, whose bombs inspire such thoughts as filled that young man's soul. He was a young Irishman, just landed, beholding the tomb of THOMAS ADDIS EMMETT. Round the corner, in Fulton or Vesey streets, there, where those new buildings are being constantly put up, a poor, contented fellow-countryman of his may be seen at the noontide meal hour, sitting in the shade of a pile of lumber, attended by his wife or sister, with his tin kettle and parcel of bread or meat, his eyes everywhere, and his lips only parting to let in a mouthful or a witticism out. And beside us is a group of idle and happy negroes setting their legs in a somewhat lazy shuffle to the discordant, but well intentioned efforts of BARNUM's brass band; and to the right is a forest of walking canes, and the Trinket Man displaying his real gold watches and chains "only six cents;" and the Type Man who will set your name up, case it, and present you with indelible ink, that your linen may defy the mistakes of washerwomen, even though you are in her debt. Busy in the crowd are the itinerant confectioner boys, a box of lozenges under one arm, the other extended, tempting strangers with a specimen of the same. Not less active in his movements, and twice as pressing in his attentions, is the peripatetic book vender, who runs through the titles of the yellow covered trash under his arm, with the velocity of a Caleb Quotem, and concludes by offering "ALEXANDER DUMAS' last great romance all complete—only twenty-five cents—very cheap, Mister."

There are oval-faced Spaniards with mild cigarettes; melancholy-visaged Italians, their loose garments whitened with the dust of the plaster Napoleons and dancing girls upon their heads; persuasive-looking Kentuckians, who, said the author of Cyril Thornton twenty years ago, are the only people in America who can understand a joke; cavalier-shaped Virginians; bright-eyed Ohioans, with a primative vigor and joyousness still beaming from their brows; rotund and easy Southerners; business-looking New-Englanders, neatly dressed, thin and thoughtful; and cosmopolitan Manhattangers, a condensation of the essences of all the others, moving about with the air of those who feel they have a right to everything, and are not slow to avail themselves of it.

From where we stand under the portico of St. Paul's, we can see on Broadway the Republic in miniature. To the right of us, extending to the Battery, are the counting-rooms and warehouses of commerce; to our left is the Aster House—emblematic of comfort, if not luxury; opposite is BARNUM's famous Museum, which, from sunrise to ten at night, has its doors open, and its man outside, handing bills by the thousand to the passing throngs, informing them of what vitalizes the interior; behind us is the church. Thus, surrounding the vitality, power and people before us, we have religion and relaxation, commerce and comfort, and, above all, the clear blue sky, as if crowning their destiny.

CHRISTMAS.

RAINY, BUT MERRY.

The Churches, the Chimney-corners, the Feasting and the Frolicking.

Among the Germans.

AT THE INSTITUTIONS.

WEDDING AT THE FIVE POINTS.

AMONG THE LUNATICS.

Yesterday was a merry day in spite of the rain. When the element pours down a day dark and dreary, it was up to them the more of terrific and all for the character. Yet if it had been anything else than a holiday it would have been dreary enough; for from early morning till the late hour was reached last night there was not a minute when the rain did not without a great umbrella. The young men grumbled out of the mouth of their mouth when they looked out, but the processes, the street of the nineteenth century and the daughters of the nineteenth were sick for them. With a clear day they would have had such games on hand! with a cold, bracing day they would have been such skating! With moderate rain there would have been such talking of things! But with rain they had nothing to do but to keep in doors, and make the most of the warm homes, the notables, and some over their wrongs, and over what their prospects, and make candy, and play blindman's buff. The older people were less inclined to be shut off from their accustomed pleasures, and gave themselves up to business or pleasure, and revenged with the children. Indeed we very much doubt if, after all, the day will not be longer remembered than any Christmas that has transpired for years.

We always pity Yankees on this 25th of December. They scarcely know what the day means, and, strange as it may seem, they are almost equally in ignorance of the proper way to spend New-Year's. New-Yorkers are better posted. Their Dutch ancestors tells more upon this than any other day of the year. Yankee children think stockings are made to hang the feet warm. New-Yorkers know that their business is to get Christmas presents in, and then, simply because nothing is to be wanted, they are worn little worn out. By nature all children are of the Dutch blood, so far as this goes, I ween.

The stores were shut up yesterday. The groceries and markets were open till ten o'clock, but so quiet that it was like Sunday around all week. The confectioners can but the carts were not in daily. Broadway after nightfall was, comparatively, as dark as Erebus, as deserted and still as an Egyptian night. The closed shutters made it look exceedingly gloomy and desolate.

The churches of the Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, &c., were not open, except where some Mission School had a celebration. They do not accept the day as a holy one, but the Episcopal, Catholic and German churches were all open. Inside them were decked with evergreens. The altars, the galleries, the columns were wreathed and festooned with them as the custom long has been. Services are held in all these and preaching. The minister in each church that our Reporters visited was spoken of as eminent. It nowhere drag as well as at the Second-avenue Church, where RAMAKE reared out grand music as tuneful and effectively as he ever did from the stage of the Academy. At this Church the choirs of pews carry the keys and admit themselves to seats by their aid. The sexton checks by counting, and gives seats to strangers under the strangers' tickets.

The Charities gave their dinners to their little folks according to arrangements, but the details were scarce.

To tell how "our folks" spent the hours would be an old story, but some of our readers are old enough to sympathize with the way that our adopted citizens celebrated the time. The east side of the City represents the Germans. We speak from a knowledge of what we see, and we speak from a knowledge of what we see, and we speak from a knowledge of what we see, and we

[illegible]

[illegible] Christmas Day is one in Germany, which, it comes after the Christmas Eve, very much resembles our Thanksgiving Day. The whole country seems to be bringing separated families together, and that it must have a good dinner. Some return to their homes, but they generally manage to get home for Christmas day, and where they cannot, they make the Christmas send them all manner of presents. He knows of many young men in business here, who yearly receive from their relations in Germany, large boxes of presents from the fatherland, such as sausages, gingerbread, [illegible] and [illegible] soaps, embroidered by the hands of their sisters.

To conclude, we must reiterate the opinion that to give and receive presents is perfectly indispensable for Christmas, for women and children.

THE GERMAN CHURCHES.

The German Churches were all very well attended, as they always are on such days; for there are many Germans who are certain to attend church on Christmas or Easter Sunday, though at other times they never enter the portals of a church. Many of the congregations had decorated the altars, baptismal fonts and galleries of their respective houses of worship with evergreens, and all, both Catholic and Protestant, presented very beautiful appearances. In the Catholic churches the services were, of course, the same as in those of other nations, of the same denomination; in the Protestant Churches there were sermons preached, by their respective pastors. In St. Matthew's Lutheran Church, in Walker-street, Rev. Dr. SCHMIDT preached an eloquent sermon, taking his text from Isaiah ix. 6.

The hymns sung were some of the most [illegible] kind, all the other were by old Dr. MARTIN LUTHER himself, and the other was also an antique composition. The melodies which they were sung were those of the glorious old German chorals, which, as they swelled towards in their majesty and might, seemed, indeed, sacred and worthy of the house of God. Whether the men of our singing-book makers would adopt some of these for their modern hymns, instead of taking airs from German operas and the drinking songs of the German students as they now do.

In the evening the school connected with St. Matthew's Church, as also those of other German churches, had Christmas trees, and the children were delighted with a variety of gifts provided by the teachers and many kind friends, of which were present, each dressed in the plaidie which beamed from the face of all. It was indeed a happy night to see the sparkling eyes at many of the poor little ones, by anxiously receiving any sort of presents.

THE CHURCHES.

[illegible] STATE CHURCH.

The morning papers announced a regular musical programme for the day at Grace Church. Mrs. ROSEDALE, the Jenny NORTHALL, was the star. The rain poured down the hour the doors opened, but there was a crowd in attendance, and the music, which was nicely performed most exquisitely, was heard with a degree of satisfaction that was in an extent commensurate to the satisfaction derived from Nature's performances out-of-doors. The outside [illegible] fellows, Evergreens decked the building tastily, and Grace was never prettier.

FASHIONABLE DOMESTIC CHURCHES.

In Dr. HORTON's Church, on Washington-square, and in other Reformed Dutch Churches, there were religious services at 11 o'clock. It was not a purely religious service, full of solemn reflections, that the audiences listened to with such attention. It was a glance at the day as a time for jollification, a season for interchanges of kindly, friendly feeling, an opportunity of gladdening, a chance to rub off the rust of constant toil, and to start the juices of life freer through the veins. The music at Dr. HORTON's is exceedingly fine.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCHES.

The Feast of the Nativity was celebrated in the Catholic Churches with appropriate and impressive ceremonial. In the German Catholic Churches Mass was celebrated at midnight. In all the Churches there were five or six separate services the last being a solemn High Mass. In the Church of the Nativity, Second-avenue, and in St. Stephen's Church, Twenty-eighth-street, the musical adjuncts of the last services were unusually rich and attractive. In the former, Signor BARIZZA and his pupil, Miss BARNUM, sang at the High Mass and at Vespers; in St. Stephen's, MOZART's "Grand Mass, No. 12," was performed with a double Choir and Chorus, with additional Organ accompaniments, arranged by Mr. KING, the Organist. The Gospel at the last Mass on Christmas Day, is taken from St. John, where the Evangelist, soaring to the eternal fountain of his great generation of the Saviour, breaks out into the exulting and inspired enunciation: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God!" &c. The Hymn of Joy, Adeste Fidelis, the air of which is more popularly known as "The Dead March in Saul," is sung in some of the Churches after the magnificent and still more appropriate "Gloria in Excelsis!"

Danish Divine Service.

Divine service in the Danish language and according to the rites of the established Church, was held yesterday morning, at 9 A. M., in St. Matthew's (German) Church, in Walker-street, Rev. Mr. SEEDORF, of Copenhagen. Owing to the state of the weather and the little publicity given, there was but a small attendance.

Excursionists.

We pities the poor Target Excursionists, they had, rather a disagreeable of it, getting free shower baths. Some looked drooping, others looked as if they had got [illegible] to counteract the bad effects of the [illegible], and still others marched boldly through the rain like old soldiers. Among the latter was the "Petmed Light Guard," which paraded our city with a full band, and several well-looking companies.

The Firemen.

The Firemen had a time yesterday. The Exempt Engine Company, (as fine a set of men as we want to see,) and some others, played over the Liberty Pole at the Fifth Ward Hotel, and added to the general dampness of things around.

The Ragged Schools.

Sunday little fellows, in garments as whole as [illegible] could afford, and as cleanly and tidy as the rules of the Ragged Schools require, and soap and Croton could make them, met in their teachers' presence early yesterday to receive the rewards of good and faithful doing. We looked in upon the meeting in two or three places. Mr. CRAPSEY's boys, in Mercer-street, were [illegible] to the feast full of smiles and gladness, and bad things made us pleasant for them as circumstances permitted. But it was a rainy and a dismal time, after all, and if it had been anything else, we should have [illegible] an attempt to [illegible] the Ragged School children. As it was, the keepers of the Ragged Schools provided a place for them in.

[illegible] the Five Points.

Whenever Bond-street is wet and muddy, you may be sure there has been a shower on Fifth-avenue and a rain-storm on the Five Points. It was the case yesterday, said Mr. MBBLE, after looking carefully at the North Pole, which is connected with the front part of his house by a curious wire, and exhibiting the South Pole, which runs down into the Dead Sea, at the rear of his dwelling, says it will be just as big as there are earthquakes in Rome. This phenomenon has a very bad effect upon the treasuries of the institutions on the Points, when Bond-street happens to be muddy, and there comes a shower on Fifth-avenue, on Thanksgiving or Christmas day. On such days, when the weather is fine, the inhabitants of the streets naturally (and some others,) go down to the Mission House and to the House of Industry, have a good time seeing the children feed, and on retiring leave something in the house at the door, to buy shoes and stockings and caps and pinafores and such like, for the inmates. But if they look out at 11 o'clock in the day and see mud in Bond-street or a rain-drop on Fifth-avenue, they know there is a storm on the Five Points, and as the pavements are in shocking order, they don't go down, and consequently the treasury boxes are not replenished. It was so yesterday, unfortunately, but that did not prevent the children from having a good time.

AT THE MISSION HOUSE.

The only peculiar feature at the Ladies' Mission House, was the gathering together of about thirty of the children, inmates of the institution, to partake of a farewell Christmas chat with the other children, previous to their departure to homes that have been provided for them in the West. The scene was an affecting one. Many of the children who leave the Mission to-day have been there a long time, and their school-mates cried at the thought of parting with them. Nevertheless, after a few brief addresses by gentlemen present, they forgot their grief, and ate their cake, and nuts, and raisins, and candies, as children should eat them, with smiling faces. One of the girls that went out this morning to the West, was brought into the Institution but two nights ago. She is a pretty aged, sweet little child, who, having lost her father and mother, had, for several days, applied to her admission, silent in the [illegible] she was brought to the Mission House by [illegible] the prison at the Tombs, who [illegible] such a creature seeking rest [illegible] The children will leave the Mission [illegible] day, under the care of Rev. W. C. VAN METER, one of the Missionaries of the Institution. They are not to be hired out as servants, but adopted by those who receive them. The same course is pursued by Mr. PRIME, at his House of Industry, with the young children. For those who are grown up he finds a home, where they live and are remunerated for the work they perform. He often sends out ten, fifteen, twenty, and sometimes as many as thirty in a day.

A WEDDING ON THE FIVE POINTS.

There is an impression in London, Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg, that the people residing on the Five Points have not a marked reverence for the institution of marriage. It is wrong, or at least partially so. People on the Five Points do get married. They don't make so great a fuss about it as some folks. They consider it a duty, and therefore don't exactly see the propriety of putting everybody to inconceivable expense for new trousers, merely because they propose doing one of the most agreeable duties that come within their sphere. There is no excitement among the keepers of fashionable hotels, and Broadway is not blocked up with carriages when a Five Pointer gets married. We know how it is done, from having attended one last evening. Just as we were leaving the office of the Mission House, a gentleman with nice long sandy-colored hair, and a sorrel complexion, came in, attended by a young lady, fresh and blooming as a sun-flower. He whispered to the porter; the porter whispered to Rev. Mr. VAN METER; Rev. Mr. VAN METER whispered to us. There was going to be a wedding, and we were invited. The groom didn't take off his overcoat; neither did he hang his hat upon a peg. He kept it in his hand and looked out of the window. The bride didn't take off her bonnet; neither did she remove her shawl. On the contrary, she pulled her shawl more closely about her; and ever and anon gave her bonnet a vigorous poke behind. She also found something of interest to look upon outside the window, and in a direct line across the nose of her intended. Names and ages and nativities were taken down. The groom was born where many have been born before him, and a few since that interesting occasion—he was born in Ireland, and was 35 years of age. The bride was at first inclined to the opinion that she also came from where there are neither snakes or toads, but after a little consideration she settled down into a firm conviction that she was only born in New-York. She was eighteen years of age. The reverend gentleman asked them, seriously, if they knew of any material objection to their being united. The lady couldn't see any possible objection, and didn't think there could be any. The gentleman gave an emphatic No! as answer. The reverend gentleman then pronounced them man and wife, urged upon them the necessity of giving their children a good common school education, at least, and, after the bridegroom had dropped a small fee on the desk, as quietly as if he had done it before, Mr. MCCLEMAN filled his pockets with nuts and raisins, and the happy pair retired. It was altogether one of the most fashionable wedding parties of the season.

AT THE HOUSE OF INDUSTRY.

Here the children received new shoes and bonnets and caps, and filled their little bellies until they were like to burst. If you had seen them as they came out from dinner, you would have sworn they had been Aldermen, for at least two terms. A gallon of turtle soup under a waistcoat never was patted with a more complacent air, and chuckle of satisfaction. To eat such a dinner would have been enough for a man to do in one day; and, consequently, the children were not required to do much else. They recited a few lessons, sang a few songs, and spent the rest of the day in social enjoyment, until time for prayers, after which they retired to dream of lots of puddings, with great-big plums in them, and sandy by the apron-full. The dinner was given by the Church of the Ascension.

At the Institutions.

At the Almshouse, at the House of Refuge, and at the Randall's Island Refuge, Christmas was recognized on the dinner-table. The presentation of dolls to the babies of the island is one of the most touching, tearful, and happy sights of the year. The poor dogs of the Prison on Blackwell's Island had nothing to make merry with but their mush and molasses, cold water, and usual salt beef.

Christmas Concert and Ball Among the Lunatics.

Christmas Day in New-York, 1855, being (so far as the weather was concerned) just the nastiest, darkest, rawest, wettest, and most miserable day we either have seen or shall see, during the present or any future Winter, it was not probable that the ladies who considerately dress and give away dolls to the children at Randall's Island would, on that day, risk their health in an excursion which might quite as conveniently be postponed to New-Year's Day, or to some day next week. We might have anticipated, very early in the morning, that the course the ladies took would be that they actually did take, on the present occasion. Our subscribers away from the local storm may be informed that the weather was, as we have described it, not fit to turn out a dog in—in fact, fit only for reporters, cab-men, and other similarly friendless and homeless wretches, who are compelled to ignore Sunday, and for whom neither wives nor a fireside are associated with the recurrence of Christmas Day.

There are some men who are truly patriotic, whose self-denial proves they love their country. We are proud to say we know of two. And they are good-looking men. There is something in that. None of your cadaverous stunted apologies for humanity that seem as if they had been built by contract and turned upon the world badly made up or very imperfectly finished in aught like a portly, erect and commanding presence; not men that like Cassio have a lean and hungry aspect. No! no! the "institutions" are cared for by at least two stout friends of the poor and needy.—Such men are Governors DRAPER and TOWNSEND. Broadcloth without, in ample measure too, and a warm heart within. We emerged from the crowded cars at One Hundred and Twenty-second-street, thankful to get into the rain, and away from the hot stench and the wet bedraggled dress of each fresh passenger, and were ourselves sufficiently drenched as we landed from the ferry on the shore of Randall's Island. There we encountered the worthy Governors just stepping on board the little boat we were leaving. From them we learned the fact that the ladies had taken the wise course to which we have already adverted. We told them that nothing but an amount of patriotism and benevolence sufficient to immortalize them could have brought from the bosoms of their families on Christmas day, and on such a day, even two of the burliest and stoutest among the redoubtable Board of Governors. Said the President of the Road, "Mr. RIPLEY will give you an outline in ten minutes of the proceedings of the day here, and then do go to the Lunatic Asylum." We thought that, being pretty considerably drenched, the advice was not inappropriate to one who indulged no insane wish to defy the wet things. "Well," said the Governor, "but the inmates of the little cottage, where we alighted, are dancing and [illegible] with an [illegible] of dishes. (It was then near 3 o'clock and they, of course, had dined from either the New-York or Astor House.) We [illegible] to the ferry at 5 o'clock, and [illegible]."

Half an hour was [illegible] in waiting in a [illegible] shed, for the departure of the boat. Six strong rowers had to fight the combined forces of the wind, the tide and heavy rain; and when, after forty minutes hard pulling, we landed on that shore where stands the Lunatic Asylum, our own revered mother might possibly have known us as a sandwhat [illegible] "as wet as a drowned rat" would be but a feeble figure of illustration.

However, Dr. BARNES's kindness very promptly made us forget the cold and the rain. Dressed in dry habiliments of his, we were fairly dozed into a room where a very agreeable social concert was proceeding. At the piano sat a young lady, and two very expert violinists were at her side. About one hundred and fifty persons were in the room, mostly females. "These, said Dr. BARNES, are all patients under my immediate care; among them are perhaps half a dozen who are sane attendants." After introduction, an exchange of conversational courtesies was so agreeably conducted, that no stranger could have supposed that he was conversing with insane persons. We sat and prepared to listen to the music. Several ballads were sung with most exquisite taste and expression. One arch-looking and really beautiful girl sang "Filikins and his Dinah in fine style. Her clear ringing voice was admirably accompanied by the violinists. We must not mention names, or we could indicate their antecedents. One of them is a thorough musician, and a fine player. Another young lady sang, at the request of the Doctor, one of MOORE's melodies in a very touching manner. Then, a young man of plain exterior, whose delusion it is that some girl whom he loved in Ireland is in that building, and for whom he is perpetually asking, sang "Molly Bawn" in tones and a style that would have been more than tolerable on the stage or in any concert-room in the world. One young man, who six weeks ago was brought here in a state of violent mania, excited roars of [illegible] by his execution of a parody on "Robbin [illegible] which he introduced some [illegible] and compliments to the [illegible] [illegible] trayers in his hands [illegible] fully medicined [illegible] of the reputation [illegible] is fortunate that [illegible] first-rate vocal and [illegible] Whatever be the best of [illegible] or painting or any imitation [illegible] discovered, his course is not [illegible] but to encourage its exercise. [illegible] is this upon the old system! Here [illegible] 300 persons, as happy and seemingly as rational as any similar assemblage of people (perhaps less entitled to the praise of rationality) in New-York. Each bid his or her insane crotchet, but the delusion is treated with kindness—not the maddening treatment of the stripe pulled and the chain. We rambled through the wards and conversed with a lady who imagines she is the wife of the President of the United States, a very respectable old lady, and with another, a lady who thinks that the Doctor has only three millions of guineas of hers in his care. Sometimes these ladies don't agree, and then it is only necessary to whisper to either of them: "Oh! never mind her; between you and me she is rather weak-headed at times."

But about the Ball. To the music of the pianoforte and two violins dancing was conducted in a very spirited, orderly and becoming manner. The English contre-dance, cotillions and waltzes forming the programme. Dr. BARNES observed that any one of these, if taken and shut up in a room, according to the system formerly pursued, would soon become desperate, and judging from the effects of solitary confinement upon the sane mind thus permitted to corrode and gnaw itself, the presumption is very reasonable. It is consolatory to think that a friend afflicted with insanity is not to be treated like a caged felon. Of course in this sanitary institution, late hours and dissipation are impossible. The festivities closed at 9 o'clock; and contrasting this with the practice of the fair dames who dance all night "till the broad day light," or leave heated rooms at midnight, we could not help asking ourselves which of the two are the lunatics!

Dedication of Dr. Bellows' (Unitarian) Church.

The "Church of all Souls," Rev. Dr. BELLOWS pastor, concerning the architectural appearance of which so much has been said and written, was dedicated yesterday morning. The service, which continued during two hours, was solemn and interesting. The congregation, notwithstanding the storm, was as large as the building, in its present condition, could accommodate well. The clergymen officiating were, Dr. BELLOWS, pastor, Dr. LOTHROP, of Boston, Dr. OSGOOD, of this City, Dr. FARLEY, and others. The dedicatory prayer, by Dr. LOTHROP, was peculiarly appropriate and fervent. So also was the sermon by Dr. BELLOWS.

The Church is situated on the Fourth-avenue—is after the Eastern style of architecture, and is consequently totally unlike any other church edifice in the City. It is built of marble and brick in alternate layers; the marble being very white, the bricks very red, and the effect produced is very curious. In the centre of the Church there is a dome of large dimensions, thickly studded with lights. The principal spire will, when finished, be the highest in the City—Trinity excepted. The interior, when finished, will be light and pleasant. The ceiling is not finished; neither are the pendant wood supports of the ceiling, which give to the interior a much plainer appearance than it will have when completed. The dome-arched windows, the carved wood-work of the galleries and pulpit are magnificent; and when the Church is completed, it will be one of the pleasantest for speaker and hearer—the most unique and imposing in the country.

One of the most touching incidents of the service was an illusion made to the late NICHOLAS DEAN, who is to be buried from this church to-day. While on his sick bed, Mr. DEAN wrote a hymn for the dedication of the church. That hymn was sung by the whole congregation, with much feeling, natural on a knowledge of the circumstances; and the service closed with prayer.

Private Theatricals.

Among the various means of making merry on Christmas night, private theatricals were resorted to in a good many houses; and, among the rest, at a certain mansion in Twenty-second-street, the comedy of the "Serious Family" was performed with great éclat. The part of Aminidab Sleek was done by Mr. W——, a Burtonian amateur, attached to one of our daily papers, with great credit to himself and satisfaction to his audience. Another gentleman, connected with one of our dailies, distinguished himself by his racy rendering of a minor part in the "Irish Lion."

Not Over Yet.

The "Wilson Industrial School" for Girls, will hold a Christmas Festival at their house, No. 137 Avenue A, on Friday of this week.

The exercises, which will consist of singing and recitation by the children, and short addresses from one or two gentlemen friends of the Institution, will commence at 11 o'clock A. M.

Specimens of work in the trade department will be exhibited. Donations in goods, clothing and provisions, would be gratefully received by the managers.

Christmas in Brooklyn.

This day was observed in the usual manner in Brooklyn, by the suspension of business and the holding of various festivals. At the Roman Catholic Churches, services peculiar to that Church were held, and of course were crowded with devotees. In several of the Protestant Churches there were also services connected with Sabbath School festivals.

CHURCH ON THE HEIGHTS.

In this Church, of which Rev. Dr. BETHUNE is pastor, there was quite an interesting celebration in the forenoon, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. The number of adults was comparatively small, but their places were supplied by the Sabbath School children belonging to the Church and the subordinate schools. In the gallery, to the left of the preacher, were the scholars belonging to the Myrtle-avenue Mission School. On his right were those of the Columbia-street School. In the body of the Church were the children of the School attached to the Dutch Reformed Chapel in Summit-street and those belonging to the Rev. Doctor's own School at the Church on the Heights. All these are principally taught by the members of the congregation, and show, altogether, a total of 450 to 500 under instruction.

After the singing of one or two hymns by the children, Dr. BETHUNE read a part of the second chapter of St. Luke's Gospel, containing the beautiful description of the birth of the Saviour, the Annunciation and the Adoration of the Shepherds. The 1st Hymn, "Whilst Shepherd's watched their flocks by night," was then sung, followed by an impressive thanksgiving prayer for all the benefits conferred upon sinners by the atonement of Christ. The 115th Hymn, "Hark! the glad sound, the Saviour's come," was then sung.

Dr. BETHUNE, addressing himself to the Sabbath School children, told them he hoped they would be able to understand what he was about to say, as he was going to preach to them, and not to the grown-up portion of the audience, and he trusted that if any crumbs fell from the children's table the elders would profit by them. His text was in the sixth verse of the 11th chapter of Isaiah: "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, the leopard shall lie down with the kid, the lion and the calf also together, and a little child shall lead them." The preacher drew a picture of the happy paradise in Eden, before the fall, and showed the change which came into the world along with sin, inspiring the bosom of man with evil passions, and changing the very face of nature itself. But God has, in his mercy, sent Christ into the world to atone for sin and restore man to his pristine purity. [illegible] the Gospel, spread [illegible] such a revolution in the heart of man as would almost justify a belief in the literal fulfillment of the prophecy in the text. The sermon concluded with an affectionate address to the children.

SAND-STREET M. E. CHURCH.

At this Church the Seventh Annual Sabbath School Mission Festival was held in the forenoon, and, as usual, the proceedings were of a highly interesting and useful nature. The house was crowded to excess by scholars, teachers and their friends at an early hour—the scholars occupying "re-served seats" near the pulpit.

The exercises were commenced by the whole school singing the hymn—"Hark, the herald angels sing," in which, as in all that succeeded, the whole school and some of the congregation joined. It was pleasant to hear hundreds of children voices mingling in such perfect harmony. Prayer followed the singing, then a boy about five years of age was placed on the table who delivered an address. The Pastor, Rev. Mr. WEED, then read the name of each teacher in the school, the motto adopted by the class and the amount of money donated by each class the past year. The sums ranged from $2 to $125—the whole amount being $1,500. The reading of the names was interspersed with singing. At the conclusion of these exercises Rev. Mr. WEED was presented with a gold watch by the Bible Class, upon receiving which a suitable response was made. Following this were addresses by Rev. JOHN MILLER, CHARLES SUMNER and others.

The scholars and teachers then repaired to their school-room on High-street, where they partook of refreshments, and presents were made to the most deserving.

There was also a Sabbath School Festival held in the Congregational Church, corner of Lawrence and [illegible]-streets, and at the Fleet-street M. E. Church the fifth anniversary of the Sabbath School was held. In all of the Episcopal Churches regular Christmas services were held.

A Reformer.

A gentleman of excellent habits in the main, and of a first-rate bringing-up, celebrated the day thus wise:

He solemnly arranged to drink no more whisky-sling, nor anything else that can intoxicate henceforth and forever, until some doctor orders otherwise. He also stopped without smoking a last cigar. Smoking and drinking, in a small way, he had tried and found wanting, either in comfort, convenience or health. We have calculated and come to the conclusion that during his lifetime, by this arrangement, he will save numberless scores of his friends from falling into a pernicious habit. It is a good time for several hundred thousand young gentlemen in America to imitate so laudable an example.

POLICE INTELLIGENCE.

Christmas was not spent very merrily by everybody. The City prisons and Station-house cells were yesterday crowded with foolish fellows, who took "a glass too much" on the previous evening, and behaved otherwise not becoming a law-abiding citizen or faithful Christian. At least two score such fellows got sober at the Jefferson Market, and some were then allowed to depart, after a lengthy advice from the presiding magistrate, Justice DAVISON.

At the Tombs, the attention of Justice CONNOLLY was chiefly taken up by listening to appeals from crying wives, in favor of bail and incarcerated husbands; and at Essex Market similar scenes were enacted. The Justices, knowing that "Christmas comes but once a year," were disposed to be merciful, and therefore granted many of the petitions prayed for. Only a few other cases of interest came up.

PICKPOCKETS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Pickpockets abound at Washington Market. Look out for them. Richard Sampson, residing at No. 195 Delancey-street, went there on Monday to make some purchases, and while doing so he felt some one pulling at his pocket. Turning suddenly round he seized a youngster who was standing close to him, and gave him in charge of an officer. The prisoner was searched, but the $43 picked from Mr. Lampman's pocket were not found on him, he having doubtless passed it to an accomplice, several of whom were close at hand. The accused gave his name as Richard Gear. Justice CONNOLLY committed him.

CHARGED WITH FELONIOUS ASSAULT.

James G. Nutt, a Policeman of Cambridge, Mass., while attempting to make an arrest at that place on the 6th of May last, had his head fractured by a slung shot, in the hands, as was alleged, of a man named Daniel Conrad. The affair took place in Washington Market, and after its occurrence Conrad fled to Cape Ann, Mass., where he stopped for some time, but recently returned to Brooklyn, where he was employed in a glass-factory. His whereabouts having been ascertained, he was sought for and arrested by an officer from this City. He was yesterday arrested and brought before Justice CONNOLLY, who committed him to the Tombs to await a requisition from the Governor of Massachusetts.

ALLEGED COUNTERFEITERS.

John Earl and Eliza Williams were arrested yesterday by Officer Sanderson of the Third Ward Police, and brought before Justice CONNOLLY, on suspicion of passing counterfeit money. When the arrests were made, Earl crammed a bill into his mouth and swallowed it, despite the exertions of the officer who seized him by the throat and tried to make him disgorge. Both the prisoners were committed for examination. The woman Williams is said to be an "adept."

A DISORDERLY HOUSE.

The Police of the Seventh Ward made a descent, on Monday night, on the lager-bier saloon of William Walkenstein, No. 551 Grand-st., and arrested the proprietor and two women said to be prostitutes. The accused was brought before Justice WOOD at Essex Market, who committed them to prison.

THE KANSAS OUTBREAK.

A Pro-Slavery Account of the Settlement of the Difficulty.

From the St. Louis Republican, Dec. 21.

A gentleman of Westport—a man of great probity of character, and who has a large fortune at stake in Kansas—accompanied Gov. SHANNON to Lawrence, and returned with him. He went there to see if something could not be done to prevent the effusion of blood, which, he says, certainly would have been the case, if there had been no interference between the parties. This gentleman, after his return, on the 10th instant, wrote to us a letter in which he says:

A committee waited upon his Excellency, inviting him to come to Lawrence. We found them entrenched, and as well fortified as could be expected for their forces. They were all well armed with Sharpe's rifles and revolvers, and other implements of war. My opinion is, they only had one piece of artillery. I think our forces could have demolished every building in the place in half an hour; but had one gun been fired on either side, I am also of opinion that the greater portion would have been killed, and no doubt many of our men would also have suffered. We numbered many more than they did. Their force was greatly overrated, and could not possibly have been over four or five hundred. We also had a great many of Sharpe's rifles, many more than they imagined, besides our cannon.

Gov. Shannon brought them to terms. They agreed and bound themselves to abide the laws, and assist in enforcing them, until such time as the Supreme Court decided the legality of the Legislature, and if so, ever afterwards; and I verily believe they will, for I am sure they saw the predicament they had got themselves into.

There are, evidently, a great many very good citizens there, as well as many very bad ones, who are always agitating and keeping the place in commotion. After the treaty, which is quite lengthy, and has many specifications, and was written by Governor SHANNON, had been signed by General ROBINSON and Col. LANE, on the part of the citizens, they accompanied us to Franklin, where they met a large number of our officers. Many speeches and pledges on both sides were made, and a friendly interchange and farewell took place—the "law and order" believing that it was better to settle it thus than by fighting, knowing that many would have been killed on both sides.

Yesterday morning the troops were disbanded, and the posse discharged.

Gen. POINDEXTER, who had been captured, with papers indicating a conspiracy, as well as other important documents found on him, was bound over to appear at Court. Many arrests were made, and after being bound over, the parties were discharged.

Thus ends this foolish and uncalled for, but most provoking attempt to set at defiance the laws, by a few disaffected aspirants, who will soon be scoffed down by the better portion of the citizens.

I would have telegraphed you oftener, but the lines are so often down, and so many exaggerated stories told by letter-writers—almost always the case on such occasions—that I deferred saying much until I could see for myself.

I pledge myself that the Lawrence men would not have made a breakfast-spell for our boys, and I think now, the sooner the thing is settled by the Supreme Court, the better. The law is now sustained, which is all that "law and order" men could ask.

SUSPICIOUS DEATHS IN BOSTON.—The dead body of JOANNA GULLIVAN, aged about 30 years, was found at her father's house, No. 128 Congress-street, Friday evening, under circumstances which, taken in connection with her expression before death, lead to the belief that she came to her death from brutal treatment received at the hands of her father, MICHAEL GULLIVAN, who is a laborer about 50 years of age, of intemperate habits. Coroner SMITH was notified, who caused the father to be arrested, and summoned a jury of inquest. Dr. STORER made a post mortem examination.

A young colored woman, daughter of a colored preacher named BRAMAN, was found dead on Friday at No. 179 North-street. It is said she was married to a man named FREEMAN, who came home from sea three weeks ago, and left the city on Thursday. The door of her room was locked, and she was found lying in bed. The indications of the stomach are that she died from poison. Dr. STORER is investigating the case.—Boston Atlas, 24th.

NEW PUBLICATIONS.

THE WORKS OF THE REV. ROBERT SOUTH, AS ARRANGED BY A CLERGYMAN OF THE DIOCESE OF LINCOLN. Edited by WALTER GRAHAM. 1 vol. Pp. 488. New-York: D. APPLETON & CO.

At one time we were [illegible] to suppose that Mr. GRISCOM had been unjustly and cruelly subjected to fifteen months' imprisonment in Java, in consequence of the absurd jealousy of the thick-skulled and heartless Dutch authorities there. With this volume before us, which would not have been written but for that hard captivity, we congratulate the reading public—at the expense of Mr. GRISCOM—on the diversion which has given rise to a work in which reality and romance are so largely and so agreeably combined. It is one of the most agreeable books of the season—not the less so, "we guess," because it reminds us, in many passages, of Fenimore Cooper. Mr. GRISCOM, who was such a rigid economist of truth, Mr. GRISCOM, "to put a fine point upon the matter," is extremely imaginative.

Mr. GRISCOM escaped from Java in the February, in a large American ship, in 1828, and opens his book by showing himself on board that vessel, relating his adventures to his companions there. He shows whence came his tendencies for a roving life, derived, no doubt, from the knowledge of wild adventures in the Indian Sea out of which his uncle had safely brought himself. He relates how his earlier education had interested him in foreign travel, particularly as respects Sumatra—how, near the Savannah's waters, he discovered, while yet a lad, one of the silver mines formerly worked by the Indians,—how, leaving this treasure, he rambled away to Mexico, where good prospects were held out to him, if he could obtain a small, serviceable vessel,—how he found and fitted up a man-of-war built schooner, called the Flirt,—and how, in May, 1801, he set sail in her, as captain, bound for Brazil. From the first he had no lack of adventure. From place to place he passed, jovially sitting from island to island on the South Atlantic and the Indian Oceans, and finally arriving at Sumatra. Of his exploits in that island we need only say that they are related much as we might expect LEVER, the Irish novelist, to expand into picturesque narrative, with Harry Lorrequer, Charles O'Malley, Father Tom, and Jack Hinton for unquestioning listeners. After a short delay, "away, and away, and away sailed he," like Lord BAYMEAN, of happy memory. He comes across Malays, as well as hairy human beings, only a little removed from the orang-outangs, and a lot of Chinese; meets with Malay beauties, and even makes way with the Princess RATMAS KOMULA, whose portrait is given, and shows her as a very pretty woman. It would seem that, at Java, where he had became popular, the Dutch officials became jealous of him, which hostile feeling was soon embodied in his arrest. This was done, with insult to the American flag, (not yet punished or atoned for,) and Mr. GRISCOM was informed that he was accused of having written to the Sultan of Jambee, proposing a scheme to destroy the Dutch. He had done no such thing. However, the Flirt was despoiled and plundered, and Mr. GRISCOM, removed from Palembang to Batavia, was locked up in the prison of Weltevreden, in the latter city, where, after some vicissitudes, he remained for fifteen months, until, in fact, the very eve of his purposed execution.

It is in prison that Mr. GRISCOM's most notable adventures took place. Whom he saw there, what he did, what acquaintances he made, how he whiled away the heavy hours, and, above all, how young and old, of both sexes, became interested in his well-doing, are detailed with force and skill in the latter moiety of the book. We do not intend to say more about it—only this, read a dozen pages and then lay it aside—if you can—the very romance of modern adventure.

There are numerous illustrations, more effective than artistical, but their very want of finish is an argument in favor of their being actualities of scenes and persons, and they are in excellent keeping with the originality and freedom of the book itself. For the sake of another such, changing the scene, we could heroically remit Mr. GRISCOM to a further captivity, but fear he would not submit to further authorship, at that price.

REMARKABLE INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF REV. J. H. FAIRCHILD, Pastor of Payston Church, South Boston. Compiled, published and sold by himself. With a Portrait. Second edition. 1 vol. 12mo. Boston: Printed for the Author.

This narrative, which is earnest, somewhat angry (not without cause) and very forcible, has every appearance of being true to the letter. Mr. FAIRCHILD was pastor of the Phillips Church, in South Boston, for several years. As a Presbyterian clergyman, he is admitted to have labored, with zeal and success, from 1837 until 1843, when ill-health, and persecutions to which he was subjected by the Deacons of his Church, compelled him to abandon the charge. Several months later, he was installed Pastor of the First Church in Exeter. While laboring in this new field, charges of immorality were brought against him, which were investigated by a Committee from the South Suffolk Association. On subomed evidence and without assuming the semblance of a legal, or even fair trial, a majority of this Committee reported their "deep conviction that Mr. FAIRCHILD cannot be innocent in this matter," and suspended him, until he should clear himself. The Association expelled him, and legal proceedings were instituted against him, at Boston, which indictment he met in person, and after a long trial before Judge WARRENER, was fully acquitted by verdict of the Jury. His character thus reestablished, certain members of the Phillips Church, who had seceded, and had been organized as the Payston Church, unanimously invited Mr. FAIRCHILD to become their Pastor. This was in 1845, and Mr. F. has vainly endeavored, ever since that time, by legal and moral force, to obtain justice from the Suffolk South Association. Last March, it is true, that body rescinded all votes upon its records, in regard to Mr. FAIRCHILD's character and exclusion—but coupled this amende with a resolution that it was inexpedient that his connection with the Association should be continued, and that "the same is hereby terminated." This proceeding is only matched by that of the Irish Jury, whose verdict was, "Not Guilty—and we recommend him not to do it again." Here is an Association acquitting a man, and yet inflicting punishment as if he were guilty. The matter rests here. This volume, which is sold by the author, (at South Boston,) has been some months before the public, without any attempt to deny its truth. One result is, that its statements have been the means of obtaining several subscriptions for the new Payston Church edifice, which, it is hoped, will be built early next year. The proceeds of the book will be devoted to this purpose by its author. We have but glanced at the very curious and interesting statements here put forward, but have given sufficient to indicate what manner of thing is New-England Congregationalism.

THE WORKS OF JOHN C. CALHOUN. Vols. 5 and 6. Edited by RICHARD K. CRALLE. 8vo. New-York: D. APPLETON & CO.

The first of these volumes consists of all the Reports of general and permanent interest, made by Mr. CALHOUN, during his Congressional career, and while Secretary of War. A selection was necessary to prevent the expansion of the work, but all of real value had been taken. Some of these Reports, hitherto affiliated upon other public men, are now reclaimed and put to the credit of the real author. The editor remarks, on the Report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (November, 1811,) that he is not fully assured of its having been drawn up wholly by Mr. CALHOUN, though its style and general opinion at the time appear to strengthen the conclusion that he was its author. He mentions some facts, also, which strengthen the grounds for this belief.

The sixth volume contains, "without special reference to subject or dates, such papers as may, in the main, be ranked under the head of political essays." Of these, some have never before been published, while others, we are assured, "appear in a different, if not more perfect state. All are given from the original manuscripts of the author, in all cases where they could be procured. Among the manuscripts which the editor has not recovered, is that of the address to CALHOUN's political friends and supporters, which, it is believed, contained some important matter which does not appear in the printed copy. In an appendix, is given "as much of the correspondence between Gen. JACKSON and Mr. CALHOUN, with the accompanying papers, as the latter thought it expedient to place before the public at the time. These, however, do not embrace all the papers connected with the subject; others exist which may, and probably will, hereafter appear in another form." Mr. CRALLE probably alludes to his forthcoming memoirs of CALHOUN now being prepared for the press.

The two volumes under notice are entitled to attentive study, as a high order—earnest, thoughtful, and melodious—is, in a manner, bound to collect it, as his contribution to the literature of [illegible]. Mr. DUNLAP [illegible] to mean order. To many he has hitherto been best known as an author of trenchant satire, entitled Farmacon or Pillory, in which he has dispensed ridicule and compliment in a very liberal manner. This competition, which displeased [illegible] is indulged in the present volume. [illegible] exception may be taken to many of the writer's so collected opinions of authors, [illegible] joined to without the [illegible] he administers to the vast array of authorities. In most of his other writings, Mr. DUNLAP [illegible] writes as if his readers were to be his peculiar [illegible] and he cared—the Fool of the Poor. Not like CHAUCER, who was by turns [illegible] not a reformer, but more resembling the late HENRY HALLAM, and the living GEORGE BANCROFT, without the extravagance of the one and the [illegible] sing-song of the other. Poverty, with its wrongs and its rights; Labor, and its ruling power; Freedom, with its throes and aspirations; Intellect, and its mission; the Human Heart, with various emotions; Love, with its alternations of tenderness, passion and despair; and a variety of other elevating and humanizing subjects, are the themes on which, in this volume, DUNLAP doth "discourse most eloquent music." We imagine from the "Dream of Boyhood," which, contains the collection, that his power of metrical composition was early developed, and so well attuned in his ear to rhythm that we have happened upon only two lines throughout the thousands which are here contained. The book is got up in a style of some gusto and handsomeness, and a portrait of the author forming an appropriate frontispiece.

SELF-CULTURE IN READING, SPEAKING AND CONVER

AGRICULTURAL.

Burning Money this Dry Weather.

An opinion still prevails, in many parts of the country, that green wood gives out more heat than the same bulk of dry. We have even seen persons burning green wood on dry wood and upon burning coal, under the impression that more heat was thus obtained. At the time we were making a trip down the Mississippi river, on one of two rival boats that chanced to be testing their relative speed, we took a station near the furnace to observe the means used for getting up extra steam. As the boat was evidently falling behind, the engineer explained the matter to be that the fellow on board was burning green fuel on the top of his dry wood, and was actually throwing water upon his fire! We think instances of such ignorance of the properties of combustibles and heat are not common among experienced engineers and firemen; but we know many persons believe that if wet or green wood is put in a stove, it will burn as good as dry, and there are some of them who prepare dry fuel to do for convenience of starting and keeping up fires, and then lay the blame of it. Let us look at this matter a little.

The old theory of combustion or burning, held it not inconsistent, was changed. There is just so much heat in a given bulk of fuel and air when entirely unmixed when they are in rapid combustion. The combination from the chemical union of the air with the carbon coal of the fuel. Thus conditions in burning, and the heat, before latent or concealed, is now "released and"—so to speak. An expanded, porous sponge may appear dry, and yet become a fire brick when sufficiently compressed. In like manner apparently cold wood and air may become a heated mass when sufficiently condensed by mechanical pressure or by chemical action, as in the combustion of burning powder. The principle we provide therefore is this: that in all cases of combustion, that is, when bodies are made to unite by rapid heat is developed. Hammering a piece of iron with smaller half dozen heat enough to make it quite hot. The condensation of the watery vapors of the air in rain or water gives out heat, and we say it is "as cold as March snow or rain." During wood or pressure, short, every action, mechanical or chemical, which compresses the particles of substances together developes heat. Blackstone, on the contrary, takes up and secretes, or hides heat. When fluids changes to steam, it occupies some 1,700 times as much space, and hides or secretes a vast amount of heat. The steam formed by a pint of water, though no hotter apparently than boiling water, in reality contains five or six times as much heat.

In burning green or wet wood, the dry portions—especially the carbon, unites with the oxygen of the air; the two unite; no more upon than the air alone, and the condensation gives out heat in a sensible manner. But the other portion, the water, does not burn nor unite with any other substance; it is converted into steam, and during the process it consumes or hides (conceals latent) a large amount of heat besides what is required to raise it to the boiling or steam point. If the steam could be condensed from the stacks and conveyed from the stack in fire-place into the room, it would then consume or give up again that yield up its latent heat; but this is not practicable nor desirable.

A block of solid green wood one foot square may weigh, say 60 pounds, and when dry only about 40 pounds. This 40 pounds much about gain in producing heat. The 20 pounds in water, which, during the seasoning process, escapes gradually, but if burned rapidly it must all be converted into steam before it can be got rid of. A certain amount of heat is first withdrawn from water to raise the sap to a boiling point, and then several times as much more is expended, when it changes to vapor. Hence then that a cubic foot of dry wood will, in burning, heat, say 100 pounds of water to boiling, and still afford as much heat for other purposes as would be yielded by the same block burned green.

A cord of wood, (128 cubic feet,) if entirely solid, would weigh when green from 5,000 to 6,000 pounds, and when dry from 4,000 to 5,000 pounds—a difference of more than a ton weight in a solid cord, which must be handled in loading and unloading, and what is usually quite as important, must be carted from the grove to the place of consumption. The wood is usually piled up, one-fourth to one-third of its bulk is occupied by the spaces between the sticks, so that the weight of a cord of green wood is from three to two pounds, (two to three tons,) or less in the lighter kinds. Still, for every cord of green wood taken from the grove at least 1,000 pounds of useless water is handled.

In whatever way we look at this matter, the use of green wood, under any circumstances, is not economical. Let every one improve this season of the year in getting enough wood cut and drying to supply all the wants of the farm until a year from next June or July, or until past Winter's cutting shall have had sufficient time to get thoroughly dry. Wood will season even in the coldest weather, and on this account it is better to cut down at once all that must be carted home during the present Winter.

Something About Plowing.

No other mechanical operation occupies half so many laborers during the greater part of their earthly existence as that of plowing. An equivalent to the entire life-long labor of at least fifty thousand men is expended every year in this country in following the plow. According to the last census there are nearly one and a half million (1,449,073) farms in the States and Territories. During the Spring and Autumn we may suppose that there is an average of fully one plowman actually at work upon each of these farms, making [illegible] PLOWMEN, all at work at the same moment! What an army of strong men! What a great phenomenon would be presented to the eye, could they all be collected with their teams and implements upon some vast plain, and there set in motion each in his own furrow.

To vary the picture, let us suppose them arranged along a straight furrow, and allow to each plowman with his team and implement a space of only two rods. The line would stretch away nine thousand three hundred and seventy-five miles, or more than one-third of the distance round the earth.

Suppose them each to plow at the rate of an acre in a day of ten hours. They would plow the whole improved land—meadows, pasture and all—of Rhode Island ([illegible] acres) in two hours and twenty-two minutes. They would at the same rate plow over the cultivated land of Delaware ([illegible] acres) in three hours and fifty-two minutes. Arkansas (781,680 acres) and Iowa (824,[illegible] acres) would be finished before turning out for the "noon baiting." New-Jersey ([illegible] acres) would be dispatched in one day, one hour and forty-six minutes. About three days would suffice for plowing each of the States of Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, Kentucky, North Carolina and Tennessee. New-York (12,488,064 cultivated acres) would be plowed over in eight days and two hours and three-quarter hours, while the cultivated land of Virginia could be finished in six days and nine hours; that of Ohio (8,251,[illegible] acres) in six days and five and two-third hours; and that of Pennsylvania (8,[illegible] acres) in five and three-quarters days.

Such figures are, perhaps, more curious than instructive, though they serve to bring before the mind an idea of the immense amount of time and strength devoted to this single operation of turning over the soil. But while we are thinking of the annual labor of these fifteen hundred thousand American plowmen, what are they thinking of, or do they think at all? How few of them have any intelligent views of the rationale of plowing, of the connection between the soil and the plants that grow upon it, of the purposes served by turning over the furrow, of the comparative value of deep and shallow plowing, of the composition and nature of the soil itself?

These are very many such questions as these, immediately connected with the routine labor of plowing, that might not only greatly vary and enliven the monotonous life of plowmen, but which investigated and understood by them would tend directly to increase the profitableness of their labors. Let us examine some of the principles involved in the mechanical preparation of the soil, and inquire, why we plow, when to plow, and how to plow.

It was the favorite theory of JETHRO TULL, one of the most interesting agriculturists of the seventeenth century, that the soil entered the plant directly, and by a process of digestion within the cells the inorganic soil became transformed into the substance of the plant itself. It accordingly with this theory, he advised and practiced a thorough and oft-repeated working of the soil with the plow, hoe, harrow, &c., which he supposed to enter through the pores or mouths of the roots, and thus gradually exhausted the soil. Modern chemistry, growing plants, experiment, observation, and the discoveries of an enlightened chemical science, have modified and in many respects superseded Tull's theory, but the means employed by him are still essential to successful cultivation.

To illustrate the present theory of the growth of plants, let us follow the progress of a plant from the time the seed is put into the ground until the new plant attains full maturity. Take, for example, a grain of wheat. An examination of its substance shows it to be composed of an outer covering of woody fibre which serves the purpose of protection, and which may be removed without injuring the vitality of the seed. Within this covering we find a mass of starch mingled with a small proportion, say one-eighth of its weight, of a substance called gluten. In the centre of the kernel a magnifying glass shows a small germ. By enveloping the grain to a certain degree of moisture and warmth, this germ gradually enlarges its bulk, being increased at the expense of the substance of the seed, until the latter is entirely consumed. The germ by this time has become a small shoot, having a diminutive leaf at one end, and a multitude of small roots at the other. When the nourishment or food supplied by the seed is exhausted the growth ceases, and the plant now dies of starvation.

If before the original grain is fully exhausted the young plant is surrounded with more food, prepared, say by finely grinding other similar grains, it will continue to grow for a longer time, provided the proper degree of warmth and moisture be kept up, and this enlargement of the new plant will go on within certain limits, so long as food is given it, and the other conditions necessary to the growth are present.

[illegible] grain in a finely divided state, intermingled with it a small portion of organic matter, that is, matter furnished by the decay of animals or vegetables, the roots, at first developed by the food contained in the substance of the seed itself, will extend into the soil, and from thence gather its own food and moisture, especially the latter. In the meantime, the leaf end of the germ will shoot up into the air, and from thence gather the same kind of elements as it before obtained from the decaying parent seed. The air is an unlimited storehouse of food for all growing plants. This food exists in a finely divided state, the particles being so small as to escape observation. These floating elements are continually being exhausted, but the exhalations from the immense mass of decaying vegetables over the surface of the earth, are as constantly making up the loss.

When the wheat plant, for instance, has once attained a root-hold in the soil, and a leaf-hold upon the air, its future growth goes on in this manner: The leaves, by means of an immense number of little open pores, or mouths, upon their surfaces, absorb or suck in the elements that are furnished by the ever-changing air, new portions of which are continually brought in contact with the plant. These elements are carried from the leaves down to the various parts of the plant, and deposited where they are needed, by means of the sap or fluids that come up from the roots through the perforated central parts of the stalk, and, after circulating through the leaves, descend through the outer portions, where the principal growth or enlargement takes place.

The sap, then, performs an important part. How far it may promote or accelerate the growth, by bringing food from the soil, we will not stop to inquire. Certain it is, that the elements for forming the great bulk of all growing plants are derived from the air through the leaves, and that a free circulation of sap is required as a vehicle for carrying the food to its proper destination. For our present purpose, it is sufficient to state that all the food of the plant, whether primarily from the air alone, or from both the air and the soil, can only be furnished ultimately by the sap. It is then, a matter of first importance that a full and continual supply of sap be provided for.

As before hinted, the sap is obtained from the soil through the roots, and the fullness and constancy of the supply will depend upon the extent of roots, and the invariable presence of moisture around them. The growth of roots depends upon the mechanical as well as chemical condition of the soil, the constant presence of moisture upon its mechanical texture, and its power to supply from below the loss by evaporation from the surface. It is mainly to provide and maintain these conditions that plowing and other manipulations are performed upon the soil.

We shall continue this subject next week, and discuss the conditions of the soil necessary to a full developement of roots, with the benefit derived from plowing and the manner of performing this operation.

Preserving and Sending Eggs to Market.

The number of eggs daily brought to this market is almost incredible. These are now gathered from all the Western States, where they have generally been preserved in lime-water first, and afterwards packed in barrels with oats and sent forward by canal and railroad. Three years ago we chanced in a small town in the interior of Ohio, and noted the current price of eggs as 5c. @6c. ⅌ dozen, at this season of the year. The local paper published in that town quoted eggs last week at 17c. ⅌ dozen, and to-day we saw a barrel of eggs from the same town standing in the store of an "egg merchant" in Washington-street, for which he paid 19½c. ⅌ dozen delivered here.

This branch of trade has become greatly enlarged and systematized within a year or two past. The country merchants in western towns, take in eggs and "pay in goods." These they pack and send direct to a commission merchant here, or more frequently sell them out to migratory dealers at the nominal cost price, depending upon the profits on their "goods" for their remuneration. The traveling dealers frequently have on hand half a million or more of eggs, and sales of 50 to 150 barrels (containing 75 to 90 dozen each) to a single egg merchant, are very common transactions.

We began, however, to note the manner of preserving and packing these eggs. The method now usually adopted is to take them as fresh as possible and immerse them in lime-water. This is prepared by putting a few quarts of unslacked lime in a tight barrel or cask, and then partly fill the vessel with water. It is allowed to stand a few days until the water has become saturated with lime, and the eggs are then carefully immersed in the liquid. Some stir up the lime from the bottom, so as to form a milky mass. This is not necessary, and does not leave the eggs as clean and neat as is desirable. A small layer of lime in the bottom of the cask is sufficient to keep the water saturated. Some packers add a small quantity of salt to the lime "to keep the pickle sweet." This is, perhaps, generally advisable, as it will do no harm if the quantity be small; and by many, salt is believed to be beneficial. We have known eggs kept for a length of time by simply placing them in a weak brine, but the salt penetrates and somewhat injures the quality; other packers add about an ounce of cream of tartar to the lime water for each twelve dozen eggs. This is said to keep the lime from adhering to the shells, thus preserving them in a better condition.

Eggs are usually sent forward in barrels, packed in oats. To make them secure, about one quart of oats is required to each dozen, or say two and a half bushels to a barrel containing seventy-five to eighty dozen. We saw some barrels packed in this way opened to-day, which were forwarded from Ohio and Indiana, and, notwithstanding jolting on carts and in loading upon railroad and canal, scarcely one in a hundred was broken or cracked. We saw one barrel opened which was limed last Spring, packed in oats in September, and received here on Saturday. The shells were nearly as clean as before pickling; there were but sixteen which were not translucent when held to a candle, and but one egg, out of 800 in the barrel, was broken.

TESTING EGGS.

The process of testing eggs is very simple, though not generally understood. Take them into a dark room and hold them between the eye and a lighted candle or lamp. The least variation from perfect soundness will be clearly shown by a lack of uniform translucency. With a very little practice, any one can accurately inspect eggs as fast as he can pick them up, three in each hand, and pass them before the candle. If this simple method of testing eggs was adopted by all dealers, we should have a market, and there would not be so great a difference between fresh and Western eggs, as our market quotations now show.

Look Into the Apple Barrels.

Apples have advanced a little during the past week; but they are still cheaper than usual at this season. Good Baldwins, Greenings and Russets are retailed now at $4 @ $5 ⅌ bbl. But their great abundance tends to make people careless in their preservation, and thousands of barrels will be spoiled by rotting during the next two or three months. A friend laid to a few barrels three weeks since, and he says one-fourth of them have already commenced to decay. On inquiry we found he had stowed them in a room separated from the basement kitchen by a single board partition, where they were kept quite warm during most of the day. This was entirely wrong. They should have been placed in the coolest room in the cellar, if put there at all.

But apples should not be put into the cellar so long as they can be kept elsewhere without freezing. A garret, chamber, or dry out-house should be used for storing them until the severe frosts come on. We have seen them stored in a barn all Winter in large quantities. As cold weather approached, loose dry straw was spread over them, just in sufficient quantities to keep out frost. The colder apples can be kept without actually freezing the better.

The most successful raiser of this fruit whom we have known, has his cellar prepared as follows: A stone wall partition is made near one side. The smaller division of the cellar thus made, is used for storing potatoes and other vegetables requiring a warmer situation. The other part is called the "apple cellar." This is covered on the bottom with a board, dry cement, and several swinging windows are provided to admit air and give free ventilation. All around the walls shelves or shelving bins are erected, one above another, and a row is also stood in the middle of the room, so that [illegible] the wall. [illegible] can be approached on both sides. Upon these shelves the apples are spread out as thinly as the extent of shelf-room and amount of apples will allow—usually the apples lie only two or three deep. The bottoms of the shelves are made of narrow boards, with half an inch space between them to allow a free circulation of air. Great care is taken to regulate the opening of the windows—which are of double glass—so as to keep the air very nearly down to the freezing point. Usually one or more of the windows are left open, or partly open, night and day. In the coldest weather they are closed at night, and opened every fair day. The apples are generally kept so cold as to require warming before eating. In this way carefully gathered apples are kept all Winter with very little loss. The shelf arrangement renders it an easy matter to look over the fruit, which is done every few weeks, when any fruit commencing to decay is at once removed from the room. Such a cellar costs but little, and, as in the instance alluded to, it pays well.

The most simple method of keeping a barrel or two of apples is to procure a quantity of sand, dry it well by setting it in kettles-full upon a hot stove, till all moisture is driven out, then let it get entirely cold, pack them in it and set them in any convenient cool place. The sand absorbs all excess of moisture, and preserves a uniform temperature; by this process all kinds of apples will keep several months beyond the usual time. Charcoal or other dry substances may be used, but sand is the most convenient and neatest.

Breeding Fish.

On this subject there is a considerable degree of interest awakened both in Europe and in this country. It is but very recently that propagating, improving, and multiplying at convenience the various finny tribes has been looked upon as at all possible. In France extensive experiments have been already made, resulting in the highest success. Similar efforts are being put forth in England, and our own country is not entirely behind. Drs. GARLICK and ACHILLY, of Cleveland, Ohio, have already made some very satisfactory trials. The Natural History Society of New-Jersey have proposed to stock the waters of the Hudson, the Delaware, the Susquehanna Rivers and their tributaries with salmon and other valuable fish if the States of New-York, New-Jersey and Pennsylvania will be at the small expense (some $6,000 in all,) of transporting the eggs and parent fish to the proper localities, and enact the necessary laws for their protection and preservation. The project is an excellent one, and we trust the legislatures of these States will not hesitate a moment in giving the small amount of assistance asked for.

We did not commence, however, to describe in this article what has been done and what may be done here, but to refer to some most valuable and instructive experiments with salmon made in Perth, Scotland, the results of which were laid before the late meeting of the British Association. The Horticulturist gives the following summary of the information communicated to the Society by their Committee:

Three hundred boxes were laid down in twenty-five parallel rows, each box partly filled with clean gravel and pebbles. On the 23d of December, 1853, 800,000 ova were deposited in the boxes; in June, 1854, they were admitted into the pond, their average size being about an inch and a half in length. From their admission to the pond, the fry were fed, daily, with boiled liver, rubbed small by the hand. By Spring of the present year, they had increased in size to the average of three and four inches in length. On the 2d of May, a meeting of the Committee was held at the pond, to consider the expediency of detaining the fry for another year, or allowing them to depart, but it was thought they had not assumed the migratory dress till the 19th, when the sluice communicating with the river Tay was opened, and every facility for egress afforded. Contrary to expectation, none of the fry manifested any inclination to leave the pond until the 24th of May, when the larger and more mature of the smelts, after having held themselves detached from the others for several days, went off in a body. A series of similar emigrations took place until full half the fry had left the pond, and descended the sluice to the Tay. It has long been a subject of controversy whether the fry of the salmon assume the migratory dress in the second or third year of their existence. So favorable an opportunity of deciding the question as that afforded by this experiment, was not to be overlooked.

In order to test the matter in the fairest possible way, it was resolved to mark a portion of the smelts in such a manner that they might easily be detected when returning as grilse. A temporary tank, into which the fish must necessarily descend, was constructed at the junction of the sluice with the Tay; and, as the shoals successively left the pond, about one in every hundred was marked by the abscission of the second dorsal fin. A greater number were marked on the 29th of May than on any other day, in all about 1,200 or 1,300. The result has proved highly satisfactory and curious. Within two months of their liberation, twenty-two of the young fish so marked when in the state of smelts on their way to the sea, have been, on their returning migration up the river, recaptured and carefully examined; the conclusions arrived at are most gratifying, and proved what has heretofore appeared almost incredible, the rapid growth of the young fish during their short sojourn in the salt water. Those taken first weighed five to five and a half pounds, then increasing progressively to seven and eight pounds, whilst the one captured on the first of July weighed no less than nine and a half pounds. In all these fish the wound caused by marking was covered with the skin, and in some a coating of scales had formed over the part.

The experiment has afforded satisfactory proof that a portion, at least, of the fry of the salmon assume the migratory dress and descend to the sea shortly after the close of the first year of their existence; and what is far more important, in a practical point of view, it has also demonstrated the practicability of rearing salmon of marketable value within twenty months of the deposition of the ova.

The Supply of Cotton.

To the Editor of the London Times:

SIR: I notice, among the numerous evils as being likely to result from war between this country and America enumerated by the "States'-Man" in the letter which appeared in your columns yesterday, the want of an adequate supply of cotton for our manufactories is one of the most prominent. The "States'-Man," like many of his countrymen, is in error with regard to this. Our own West India colonies are quite competent to supply all that would be required. Jamaica alone is capable of producing sufficient for the consumption of the kingdom; indeed, no country in the world offers a finer field for growing it. Wherever it has been planted, in the lowlands and mountains, the result has been uniformly successful and the produce of a superior quality. This was fairly proved five years ago when a movement was made in the island with a view to the resumption of the culture of cotton as an article of export, and patches of it were planted in the different districts; but it failed as a speculation solely from the generally poverty-stricken state of the planters, who lacked capital to carry out the scheme extensively.

Samples of the cotton grown upon this occasion were submitted to the cotton brokers in New-York. The Sea Island description was valued by them at [illegible]

Cotton Factory in India.

A cotton-spinning factory, on the regular Manchester model, has been opened in Western India. It is near Broach; is worked by steam; has 1,500 spindles; and will give permanent employment for 800 hands. The whole has been built, and the machinery all put up, in ten months. The Bombay Gazette says:

"We are to have mills of a similar character in Bombay shortly; they are now in course of erection for a joint stock company of local origin. If efficiently and economically managed they can hardly fail of success. Under the same conditions, a mill of the same kind near Calcutta, at Fort Gloucester, yields large profits, and its yarns sell in the Calcutta markets at least as high as those of Lancashire."

Louisville and Nashville Railroad.

From the American Railroad Journal, Dec. 22.

The City Council of Louisville have authorized an additional subscription of $[illegible],000 to the stock of this road, subject to the decision of the legal voters of the place. To pay the above, the issuance of City Bonds are to be made, dated as follows: $[illegible],000 at 1st of April, 1856; $250,000 at 1st October, 1856, and $250,000 at 1st April, 1857—all bearing six ⅌ cent interest, payable semi-annually, and the principal being made redeemable in the City of New-York, at the expiration of 30 years from date. Provisions are made for meeting the interest as it falls due, and the application of the money to the completion of certain specified parts of the work—the principal to be met by a sinking fund.

The British Arctic Discovery Ship "Resolute" Brought to the Port of New-London.

From the New-Haven Journal, Dec. 24.

The discovery ship, sent out by the English Government, in search of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN, and which was abandoned in the Arctic Regions by her officers and crew, a year or two since, has fallen into the hands of a Yankee, (Captain BUDINGTON, of New-London,) and is expected at that port daily. Captain BUDINGTON was sealing for whales in the Northern seas, when he fell in with the Resolute, drifting. Giving his own vessel in charge of the first mate, he went on board with fifteen of his crew, to navigate her home. His own vessel has reached New-London, and the Resolute will soon follow, unless Captain B. has concluded to winter on the coast of Greenland. The Chronicle says:

"When the two vessels parted company, they were in about latitude 65° N.—some two degrees south of the spot where the Resolute was first found. The Resolute was a new vessel when she left England, was built in the most substantial manner and was excellently well found. Though she had been abandoned about a year when Capt. BUDINGTON took possession of her, her sails, rigging, and all of her appointments were in good order, and she would without doubt make the passage here without delay. When found by Capt. BUDINGTON, she was at least one thousand miles from the spot where she was abandoned by her officers and crew. The George Henry had a hard time of it after leaving her consort, but has arrived safe, though leaking badly. She lost her rudder in the ice soon after parting with the Resolute, and there being no carpenter on board, the Captain and mate managed in about half a day to make a rough substitute for one, and have brought the bark home with it, though it has been unshipped three or four times and left the bark at the mercy of the waves for long intervals, which greatly retarded the passage home. The officers and crew certainly deserve great praise for their spirit and perseverance."

Since writing the above, we learn from the Chronicle that the Resolute arrived at New-London this morning, where she is attracting much attention, and is said to be a great curiosity—being just as she was fitted out. The Resolute is about 350 tons burden—and with a cargo, will prove a fortune to Capt. BUDINGTON and his brave sailors. We shouldn't wonder if an examination of this strange visitor should induce quite a rush to New-London to-morrow.

From the New-Haven Palladium, Dec. 24.

Our city has become the scene of another atrocious crime, the effect, it would seem, of pretended religious belief. A Mrs. EMONA WAKEMAN, a woman some 70 years of age, residing in Beaver-street, near Pierpoint, is the sole proprietress, or leader of a small band of believers in Millerism, or something similar, and the meetings of the members of the faith were held at her dwelling. Yesterday, as usual, the faithful met, and among the number was Mr. JESTUS MATTHEWS, a workman in the pistol factory at Whitneyville. The meeting was kept up nearly all night, and, about 9 o'clock this morning, Mr. MATTHEWS was found by his son, in the front room of the house, dead, with his throat cut from ear to ear. Near the body was a small rope, with which the hands had evidently been bound, as the wrists bore the marks of the cord.

The story told is that the deceased, although a partial believer in the doctrines held by Mrs. WAKEMAN, did not come up exactly to the standard inculcated by her and the others, and therefore he was a stumbling block which they were justified in putting out of the way. How this may be, we do not know, but it is evident that his death was not caused by his own hand. Deceased was between 30 and 40 years of age. A Jury of inquest was summoned, but they have delayed their verdict until after the post mortem examination, which will be had this afternoon. The following persons have been arrested on suspicion of being implicated in the murder, either as principals or accessories: ISRAEL WOODEN, ALBERGO SANFORD and wife, SABINA SLY, JOSIAH JACKSON, ABIGAIL SABINS, THANKFUL S. HERSEY.

The Coast Survey—Shoal in Nantucket Sound.

Subjoined is a letter from the Superintendent of the Coast Survey to the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating the discovery of a shoal south of the Cross Ripe, in Nantucket Sound, by Lieut. Commanding C. R. P. RODGERS, United States Navy, assistant in the Coast Survey:

NEW-YORK, Tuesday, Nov. 6, 1855.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate the discovery by Lieut. Commanding C. R. P. RODGERS, United States Navy, assistant in the Coast Survey, of a shoal south of the Cross Ripe, in Nantucket Sound, and to append the following extract from his report relative to its position and dimensions:

"The true bearing of the shoal from Nantucket light is very nearly south, and its distance a mile and two-fifths. The least depth of water upon it is eleven feet; its length in a general north and south direction is nearly three-quarters of a mile, and its breadth varies from five yards to a quarter of a mile, the greatest breadth being at the southern extremity."

I would respectfully request authority to publish the foregoing. Very respectfully, yours,

A. D. BACHE, Superintendent.

Hon. JAMES GUTHRIE, Secretary of the Treasury.

DESPERADO SHOT BY A WATCHMAN.—Last night, about 9 o'clock, Officer EDWARD WILLIAMS had a rencontre with MARK BRICKWEDE, a notorious character, whom he was endeavoring to arrest. BRICKWEDE resisted, and TRIPPED WILLIAMS down twice, and kicked him in the face. WILLIAMS finally succeeded in drawing a pistol, and placing the muzzle close to the head of his antagonist, fired, the ball taking effect in his forehead, from the effects of which he died. Officer WILLIAMS delivered himself up, and was lodged in jail. The cause of the difficulty was BRICKWEDE's taking some oranges from a confectionery.—Louisville Courier, Dec. 24.

DEATH OF A MINER.—AZ HIMM WEAVER, the well-known miner, from [illegible], died in this city, [illegible] last week, after a short illness. The deceased was a [illegible] miner, and amassed a handsome fortune, which he is supposed to have left behind him. The deceased was [illegible] years of age, and was a native of Pennsylvania. He was [illegible] and [illegible] to fifty thousand dollars, but unfortunately for the parties interested as heirs, he has [illegible] of his fortune. Of his history, [illegible] friends, nothing is known, and any allusion to it always exasperated him. His lawyer, so far as at present is known, no one to inherit his estate [illegible] will, in all probability, escheat to the State. We will hear yet more discovered, and it is [illegible] any. The manner of life and pecuniary habits of the deceased are almost [illegible]. For the last sixteen years he has constantly worn the same [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] the possibility of wearing out, except on some important occasions, such as land sales, or something of that nature, when they gave place to a suit of black velvet, that he often wanted [illegible] him faithfully for many years. He died by the disease of which he died by walking over the hot rocks during the most scorching weather of the season, all the way to Putnam and Henry Counties to pay his taxes on the land he owned there, and sufficient clothing to protect him from the cold. In fact, we are informed that he scarcely ever wore a shirt or any other [illegible] when he died, had not been changed for over three months. It is believed that he [illegible] since, notwithstanding the piles of gold and silver he had hoarded away, he actually suffered on six hours' labor he had put out to those [illegible] he succeeded in selling it for half a dime.—Dayton Democrat, Wednesday.

A COLD-BLOODED VILLAIN.—We copy the following from the [illegible] Sentinel: "Last week HAY arrested a man named WILLIAM [illegible] charging him with the murder of [illegible] under circumstances: Several months since [illegible] came to New-York and settled in California. He was very respectable [illegible] and his arrival he became acquainted with a lady [illegible] married. On Saturday, [illegible] left the same [illegible] and [illegible] the husband of the young lady objected to the match, but afterwards [illegible] consented to his marriage, and when they [illegible] the husband [illegible] entire fortune, consisting of $2,000 in gold and [illegible] horses and [illegible]. Burton soon sold the [illegible] of his wife and, abandoning possession of [illegible] deeds of the sale, he broke open her trunk and took the money. The husband [illegible] that he had only married her for the purpose of [illegible] this last money, and that the night [illegible] that he was going to start for Wisconsin. The [illegible] mediately left Chillicothe, and had got as far as this city, on his way westward, when he was [illegible] by the officer as above stated. If he does not get twenty-one years in the Columbus Penitentiary, justice will be grossly cheated of her due."

HORRID MURDER.—We learn from the Portsmouth (Ohio) Herald of the 8th inst., that a man named WILLIAM WILLIAMS had been murdered near West Union, in Adams County, by the murder of an old man, named Brown, and his wife. It appears that the deceased were the owners of a small farm of which Williams claimed the possession. In order to accomplish his purpose, he forged a deed of the premises, and then [illegible] tally murdered the old people. The [illegible] and was committed about three weeks since, and yet no suspicion of the foul deed was [illegible] attached to WILLIAMS. He [illegible] that he had bought and paid for it, and had a deed [illegible] but that he did not know what had become of Brown and his wife. Some one, in [illegible] observed that it was not acknowledged on the part of his wife, and that Brown's name was spelled wrong. The murdered bodies were found some hundred yards from the house, buried together some two feet deep, and then covered over with [illegible] over them. They had only their night clothes on, Brown had twelve wounds on his head and face, and the woman had seven, their skulls being fractured, and their brains protruding.

TRIAL FOR A MURDER COMMITTED FOURTEEN YEARS AGO.—At the last Assizes in Whitby, C. W., a man named BENJAMIN STANNARD, of Markham, and his two sons, were tried for the murder of [illegible] SHAW—a crime committed fourteen years ago. The principal accused is a wealthy farmer, and had been suspected at the time of the murder, but no evidence was obtained against him. A witness, JOHN ELLIOTT BUCK, who had worked for Stannard, and between whom some [illegible] came forward and swore that he saw the murder committed, and [illegible] with a great degree of atrocity. The witness, it is said, is not a very reliable person, and his testimony was disregarded by several [illegible] declared that the man who was said to have been killed, was seen about two weeks after the period fixed as that of his disappearance by the witness Buck. Other evidence was adduced, but difficulty in reaching a verdict of guilty, which they rendered in about nine minutes after leaving their seats. From the prominent position of the family of the accused, who are wealthy farmers, and the mysterious circumstances connected with the charge, the trial created the most intense interest, the Court-House being crowded throughout to its utmost capacity, by persons who flocked to hear the proceedings.

NORTH AMERICAN PHALANX.—The final sale of the personal property of this Association, in Monmouth County, commenced on Wednesday, 5th inst., before a large assemblage of farmers, stock buyers and others. The bidding was spirited, and the prices realized were good. The sale [illegible] with the seeds, small tools, and general gardening appurtenances; after which followed the plows, harrows, rollers, cultivators, horse-powers, threshing machines, &c. The sales of horses, mules, and milk cows concluded the first day's sale. Eight horses and mules, single and in pairs, brought an average of [illegible] each; [illegible] $85; one Empire cott, 1 year old, $74, and [illegible] five milk cows an average of $[illegible]. One of the old-fashioned side-wing plows brought $[illegible] and Ploger lifting plow, $3 50. The wagons, carts and other vehicles, several yoke of oxen, harness, [illegible] and the like, were sold the second day, and the various household goods were offered daily until the whole of the personal estate of the large Association was disposed of.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

CHILD ATTACKED AND BITTEN BY A RAT.—A most singular occurrence happened in the house of Mr. Wm. CRAWFORD, (formerly keeper of the old [illegible] St. Charles,) on Penny-wash-avenue, last Wednesday night. A young daughter of his, a mere infant, was lying in the bed asleep, when she was attacked by a huge Norway rat, which began to bite her lips and her arm and head. A little boy in the same bed awoke and endeavored to drive the animal away, but he too was bitten in three or four places on the hand. The girl's hand from the wrist to the end of the thumb was bitten in a dozen different places, and she is quite seriously injured. The screams of the children attracted the mother to the bed, and not until then did the vile beast leave them. He was afterwards caught, and summarily dispatched and executed on him.—Pittsburg Gazette.

The Nicaragua Recruits and the Administration.

The steamer for Europe, to-day, as well as the Northern Light, for Nicaragua, will carry out very full reports of the proceedings by the General Government, taken through the District-Attorney in this City, in regard to the preservation of the faith of treaties and the strict observance of our neutrality laws. The sequel, it will be seen from the occurrences which followed the arrest of the Transit steamer by the Revenue Cutter on Monday afternoon, is the complete triumph of Law and Order. The commands of the Executive have been carried out. The inherent power of the Federal Government to enforce its treaty obligations has thus peaceably asserted—not, to be sure, without the show of force, but without bloodshed or popular demonstration toward rescue. What may be thought of the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty of 1850, in the abstract—however arbitrary it may be deemed to interfere with the sovereignty of the State of Nicaragua, as established for the time being, by General WALKER—the existence of the Treaty is a fact which has in itself to demand the exercise of Whatever authority to preserve it in letter and in spirit. It is a more solemnly binding instrument, if possible, than the ordinary laws of the land, inasmuch, as it does, a solemn compact with a Foreign friendly Power. Whether the Treaty itself ought not to be abrogated, or brought to an end by due notice and mutual consent, or not, has nothing to do with the present question. While it exists, its provisions must be, as they have been on the present occasion, faithfully observed.

We do not rejoice over the result as a triumph over the purposes or designs of a weak Government, like that of Nicaragua. The credit might have been greater if the Government had established its authority where the chances of retaliation would have been more equal. But the assertion of Treaty Law is not the less to be congratulated. It will equally fortify the Executive in properly vindicating any past or future outrage upon our rights as neutrals. It is, besides, another evidence of the disposition of the Government to act in good faith towards all nations, weak or strong. It but follows up the measures taken to arrest the interference of our people with the rights of Spain in Cuba—for which, by the way, the English press has not thought proper to render proper credit.

The truth is, though often questioned by political writers abroad on the affairs of the United States, our Government is eminently conservative, as well in its Foreign as in its Domestic policy. The people at home know and feel this. The occasion has never arisen in its eventy years' history, from the excise rebellion in Pennsylvania in 1797, down to this good hour, when its inherent power and moral force were not equal to the peaceable assertion of the supremacy of the laws. It was so in South Carolina in 1832, when the Legislature and whole people of that State seemed to be in open rebellion. It was so in the Canadian outbreak of 1838. It was so in the Cuban expeditions of 1849-51, when popular sympathy through the Southwest was very strongly enlisted against Spanish oppression on that island. It will ever be so, when the emergency calls for it—whether of Foreign or Domestic origin.

This much we dare say for the Government, without respect to the men or men who administer it. For the information of the London press, which recently went out of its way to attack the present Administration, as an election-contriving popularity-seeking party, we go further, and assert that the present Executive and his Secretary of State are as conscientiously devoted to the preservation of the Laws and Treaties of the United States, as the British Cabinet itself is to its international obligations. They could not be otherwise if they would, understanding the temper of our people and the genius of our Government, and would not, we dare say, if they could, being duly sensible of the dignity of their high position, and equally so of the future fame of their Administration. The London Times was never more mistaken than in supposing that any administration or party in this country could be so weak as to rest its chances of existence or perpetuation on the violation of international obligations or the wicked and lawless encouragement of filibustering. Our rulers are not quite to weak in sagacity, nor our people so loose in political morals. In truth the People are the Government, and with such a People, practical in all their purposes, no Chief Magistrate, by whatever circumstance, or accident, if you please, he happens to be elected, can venture the responsibility of leaving either Laws or Treaties without force. From the moment he takes the oath of office, he becomes, in the largest as well as the strictest sense, the sworn conservator of both. The weakest of our Presidents has proved himself equal to their just and firm administration. The strongest dare not do less.

Female Industry.

There has been a school of Design for Women in operation here for three or four years, under the charge of benevolent ladies, who have most laudably endeavored to enlarge the sphere of woman's vocation, and afford a new field for her genius; but the results have not been very promising, though a few pupils have evinced considerable talent in drawing on the block, and in wood engraving.

In London there is a Government School of Design for Women under the charge of Mrs. McIAN, a lady of some reputation as an artist, and some of the published designs of the pupils have been very creditable. In Paris there are several very excellent female wood engravers, and, as illustrated works are now common among us, we see no reason why women should not become artists in this line; it is an employment perfectly adapted to their patient habits and delicate manipulations. The only difficulty lies in the fact, which is the great stumbling block to the employment of women in any other sphere than that of the household, that just as she becomes perfect in her art she fulfills her destiny by becoming a wife and a mother; and, instead of being an artist, must sink, or rise, into the condition of help-mate for her husband. All the time she gave to preparing herself for an artist is then wasted, and, as every woman must feel that this will be her fate, what encouragement can she have to spend her holy-day of existence in learning an art which she can never make available? The Superintendent of the Government School of Design for women in London lately published a report in which he stated that the great difficulty he had to contend with was that his pupils got married as soon as they began to be useful, and were lost to art. In order to obviate this difficulty he had given the preference to ugly women; but, as homely women are generally more amiable than beautiful ones, he found that it made no odds, and that his homely pupils were sacrificed at the hymenial altar just as fast as his beautiful ones.

But there are some women who have decided artistic sympathies, who, from choice or necessity, may not become wives, and may prefer to exercise their talents in the arts of design, to the ordinary employments of women; such may find opportunities of improvement and obtain employment by application at the School of Design for women, on the corner of Broadway and Bronome-street, where, we believe, pupils receive gratuitous instruction from a competent teacher.

We remember seeing a large number of young women at work painting and gilding porcelain vases and table furniture, in one of the lofts of a crockery store in Broadway, a year or two since; but we understand that they were only allowed half the pay that was given to men for the same work. If women cannot paint large pictures, they should, at least, be able to design the ornaments for their own dresses and cap ribbons, instead of allowing men to monopolize that kind of work.

The Indians—A War of Extermination.

A brilliant historical writer has compared the Indian character to rock, whose form cannot be changed without the destruction of its substance. The whole annals of the ill-fated Red Men corroborate the simile. The aboriginal races within the limits of the United States have, with few exceptions, resisted all civilizing influences, utterly refused either subjection, amalgamation, or improvement, at Anglo-Saxon hands, and have fallen, rank after rank, fighting to the last, within the shadows of their ancestral forests, for the hunting-grounds of their fathers. Their van has been driven back, and further back, until they are all forced beyond the Mississippi. And now, suddenly, they are pressed by great detachments from civilization, who flank them from Utah and New-Mexico, and encroach upon their narrowing territory from the rear, in California, Oregon, and Washington. Upon the barren plains, and among the dreary mountain-ranges of the great desert-heart of North America, they have for some time maintained a precarious existence from the yearly decreasing bands of the buffaloes, the trifling avails of other hunts, and the insignificant fruits of some little unskillful agriculture, eked out with wild roots. But the ring of advancing settlers now hems them in on all sides. From Minnesota, Washington Territory, Oregon, California, and the Mormon and half-Mexican settlements at the South, they are steadily compressed within their narrowing deserts; and steadily is starvation staring them more and more nearly in the face.

With the stubborn hardihood of their race, however, the few survivors seem to be resolved to die in the vain effort to maintain what ground is left to them, unsoiled by the step of the white man. By the advices which the last few arrivals bring from our Pacific and Trans-Mississippian possessions, there seems to be now waging a concerted and general, yet loose and disorganized attack upon the whites, similar in character to the enterprises of KING PHILIP, of PONTIAC, of TECUMSEH and BLACK HAWK. In the Columbia, Rogue River and Willamette Valleys, beyond the Rocky Mountains, in the mountainous region east of the California settlements, in the vast plains haunted by the Sioux and Pawnees, which stretch from the foot of the Black Hills eastward to the settlements upon the borders of our States, the Indians seem to be everywhere rising after their old manner, ambuscading individuals and parties, firing houses, murdering and scalping man, woman and child; in short, devastating and destroying every person and thing which has the mark of civilization upon it, with all the old Indian blood-thirstiness and blind, unthinking barbarian recklessness of consequences. And, as always heretofore, the more slowly moving Anglo-Saxon power is rising around them with its old, steady, exterminating purpose, to erase forever these last remnants of the red tribes. HARNEY moves westward from the frontier forts upon the Sioux and Pawnees, with a strong body of regulars. Governor CURRY, of Oregon, is preparing to sweep the Rogue River, Walla Walla and other Pacific tribes, out of Oregon—and extinction—with a thousand volunteers, if they join the United States troops. Governor MASON, of Washington Territory, has summoned volunteers from that Section for a like purpose. The whole white population is beyond endurance exasperated at stealthy daily murders committed by the Indians, in their national warfare. Thirty men and women are heard of, assassinated singly or by families, within ten days. Sixty more similar cases are registered at another time. Daily reports of such atrocities have awakened all the settlers; and they will probably not rest until there are no more Indians left within their borders. This done, there will be none of the race in the United States, except those settled in agricultural communities in the different "Nations" and "Reservations" west and northwest of Arkansas, and the few scattered relics farther east.

A great outcry has more than once been raised about the diabolical injustice, so called, of the exterminating and revengeful character of the measures now being pursued against the Indians. This, however, is far from being a reasonable objection; although, we must confess that the case is prima facie strong against the present Administration, since it is one where we, the stronger nation, are arming against the weaker—a well-known trick of the heroes now managing the Executive and Departments. And this final extinction of whole nations, who are, moreover, after their savage fashion, only striking for their Fatherland, their homes, and their rights, is inexpressibly sad to the philanthropist and the Christian. Yet it is, apparently, a necessity. The Anglo-Saxon race will spread—and the forests must fall, and the desert must grow green and flowery, before and around its advancing footsteps. Its pioneers will be rude and uncultivated men, of fierce hearts and strong and ready hands—who will rock little of the wild savage, his frights or his wrongs, his comfort or his anger. The proud and passionate savages will waylay and murder, as they always have; and the revengeful frontiersmen will, as heretofore, kill the "Indian devils" like so many dogs. Unless the forest pioneers are exemplarily forbearing and forgiving Christians, or unless the savages shall become such in advance of them, neither of which conditions seems likely to be fulfilled, the collision is absolutely necessary; and as surely as it comes, the aborigines will perish. Their few remaining roving bands, scattered and weak as they are, can offer no substantial resistance to the attack of the whites. Their numbers are set, by guess of the Oregon papers, at ten thousand; it is, however, very unlikely that there are more than fifteen hundred or two thousand fighting men of them, all told. Few or many, they will all have perished ere long; and the roving Indians of Central North America will be known only in tradition.

Women and Horses.

A French lady, called Mme. ISABELLE, some years ago, commenced studying the character of that noble animal, the horse, and soon became satisfied that all the various systems of training and breaking were radically wrong. She, accordingly, began to experiment on a more reasonable system of her own, in which she has been as successful as our countryman, VAN AMBURGH, in taming lions and tigers.

Her plan was to make the horse more tractable by developing his intelligence, and gaining his respect and affection.

Most people underrate, not only the intellectual capabilities of the inferior classes of their own race, but those of the brute creation. Unruly and ill-natured people generally have unruly and ill-natured servants and animals, if they have any at all.

In Arabia, where the horse has attained to the highest physical development, docility and beauty, he is treated with the greatest gentleness and care. If we may be allowed the expression—his moral sentiments—such as affection for his master and all the members of his household, even to his children, being the playmate of their pastimes, and sharing his wild oats with theirs; his endurance in fatigue and privation, and his courage in battle; there being instances on record of his having cheerfully sacrificed his own, to save his master's life, and where the attachment of his owner is so strong as to make him refuse the offer of thousands of dollars for him, are developed by continued kindness and affection.

That this kind of treatment has, to some extent, the same effect on the noblest of animals, that it is known to exert on the lowest of the human races, is proved by the higher sagacity and attachment manifested in the stud of the desert, and by the success of the lady who is the subject of the present article, if it did not suggest to her woman's nature the system itself.

She first gives the horse to understand, by the simplest and gentlest means, what she wants him to do and how to do it, encouraging or reproving by tone, look and gesture as gently as possible.

In punishing animals or children, the whip, like calomel, in medical treatment, should never be resorted to but in desperate cases, and then be used in large doses.

She begins by accustoming the horse to carry his head high, whereby she prevents the weakness caused by curving and constraining the muscles of the neck, and has a better command over the mouth. She then places on the horse a surcingle, surmounted by an iron rod fifteen inches long, which is bent about four inches forward at the summit. On each side of the rod are placed four rings, destined to receive reins according to the height that may be desired. The horse soon gets accustomed to this check, and it exercises a great moral effect over him. He places his head in such a manner as not to suffer from the bit in the mouth, and thereby soon gets accustomed to being held in hand by his rider or driver.

The surcingle also accustoms him to adopt to the best gait, and to advance or stop without any resistance. The breaker-in remains at the left of the horse, and is armed with a whip having a spar in it.

After forming her system, Madame ISABELLE went into Germany, and practiced it with a thousand fractious horses, that have belonged to Prince EUGENE NAPOLEON, at Vienna. From Vienna she went to Russia, and there stopped two years. In the course of that time she rendered completely docile all the most restive horses of the old cavalry regiment at St. Petersburgh, as well as those of the Emperor NICHOLAS. About two years since, she returned to France, and having explained her plan and stated its results to the Minister of War, she was, by the special direction of the Emperor, who was consulted, authorized to practice it on a number of young horses, of the regiment of Guides, and with an equal number of recruits, who had recently joined the regiment. The lessons were given under her direction, at the riding-school of the Ecole Impériale d'Application d'Etat Major. After the fifteenth lesson, the horses manœuvred with the quiet and savoir faire of old troopers.

This remarkable female equestrian is now employed as riding mistress for the British cavalry, which, particularly "the Guards," is the best in the world, owing partly to the fine physique of the men and horses—the former being of an average height of about six feet, and that of the horses of 15 hands.

Some thirty years ago, it being thought that the uniformity and grace in the seat of this cavalry might be improved, a Colonel PERZEL, a semi-German, received the appointment, and for several years he instructed the dragoons in horsemanship, in Pimlico riding-school. In 1825 Col. PERZEL was removed and another German, Lieut. MYZAL, with the local rank of Captain, was imported to take his place.

That foreigners were preferred to teach British troops, was thought a slur to a nation in which "the turf" can be said to be an Institution, and where fox-hunting is a national pastime. But although his horses are excellent and graceful, and John Bull is fearless at a steeple-chase, or in clearing a ditch or "rasher," yet, whether from the habit of riding with his stirrup in the hollow of the foot, instead of under the ball or toes, or on account of a natural gawkishness, as has been claimed by some, his seat as a civilian, in the saddle, is anything but graceful or dignified.

A French woman, evidently every way fit for the task, is employed to teach British dragoons and British horses, as French dancing masters do our young people, graceful movements and good manners.

The old campaigners and gallant Hussars—the Lieutenant-Colonels, Adjutants and Quartermaster look on approvingly, and Sergeant-Mayor and Sergeants obey her nod. A tall trooper carries a basket of carrots to feed the horses, when they perform well, while a six-foot orderly, twice a day, escorts this fair staff officer to and from the place where she trains troopers and chargers.

The pose of Madame ISABELLE is novel in England—as she rides with two stirrups and uses a saddle like a man's. This is a a sensible improvement, for nothing could suggest itself as more absurd than the present fashionable way of hanging a lady up on a peg on the side of a horse, pinned up in a bag of skirts, with her limbs arranged in the most constrained and awkward manner. In Turkey, Arabia and South America the ladies ride in the same position that the men do, far surpassing our best female equestrians in grace and daring, while they are much more secure against danger of being thrown, or dragged to death, in case they lose their seat.

Professor KISS's bronze statue of "the Amazon," exhibited at the Crystal Palace, affords a beautiful vindication of the common sense evinced by Madame ISABELLE. To that portion of our fair countrywomen who favor the development of female energy, something like the Oriental costume, with this new fashion, may not be unacceptable. In fact it should not be to any; and Madame ISABELLE, after she has taught the British troops and their horses, has a mind to do so, she might come here and recruit a few regiments of strong-minded women as volunteers for the Crimea, without any infringement of international law or any opposition from our Government, while she might hope for better success in introducing a new fashion than attended the efforts of Mrs. BLOOMER.

The Tribune on Self-Laudation.

We have no disposition to quarrel with the Tribune on a mere question of taste; if it sees fit to announce to the world every morning its growing prosperity, the amount of its weekly receipts, its devotion to its principles, its willingness to be sacrificed in maintaining them, and the value and integrity of its cattle market statistics, it is no business of ours. We shall never interfere to prevent it from regaling its readers with such bits of intelligence. But we are constrained to say, that it is rather remarkable that a paper which makes so common a practice of blowing its own trumpet, should be so greatly excited because we published, as an item of intelligence, a resolution passed at a meeting of cattle dealers, commending the cattle market reports of the Daily Times, and recommending this paper to the fraternity for its reliable information on that subject. The Tribune first thanks the cattle dealers for not recommending that paper as their "organ," and immediately afterwards, to show the sincerity of their gratitude for the favor done it, defies the cattle dealers to do their worst. Fœnum habet in cornu.

Rights of Omnibus Riders.

It is not always the gravest matters that are of the greatest importance to every-day people. We have read a good many long newspaper articles on the "Rights of Neutrals," but we do not remember having ever seen a treatise on the "Rights of Omnibus Riders;" and, as everybody with a white complexion rides in omnibuses, a few words on that subject will not be considered out of the way, especially at this season, when people ride more than at any other.

There is a general impression among our countrymen that a man has no right to keep his seat in any public conveyance when he sees a lady without one. If he gives up his place, as nine men out of ten will, it is accepted, not as a courtesy, but as a matter of right. This state of things has been often generated on by foreigners as most creditable to our national character, and Mr. THACKERAY makes very graceful allusion to it in his lecture on Charity and Humor. We have seen a gentleman, when a gentleman did not instantly vacate his seat, look at him as though he had done them a personal injury, while others with one rib of politeness, scant themselves on the knee of the gentleman nearest to them. We had supposed that the custom of offering a seat to a woman, whether she were old or young, well-dressed or otherwise, was so universal with our countrymen that it had become a recognized law of public conveyances that no female must be permitted to stand while a seat was occupied by a man. We have often seen gentlemen give up their seats in an omnibus, and even stand outside when it was raining, to give room inside for a woman of humble appearance; and we have always exulted in the native gallantry and tenderness of our countrymen towards woman, because she was of the gentler sex, and not because of her beauty or gentility. The "strong-minded" ones may believe, affect to scorn this national deference for the gentler sex, as an implied confession of our inferiority, or weakness. But the majority are willing to receive such attentions as a homage to their fascinations. It springs unquestionably from a high-toned morality, and an elevated refinement of sentiment. We were once crossing the East River to Brooklyn when there was a crowd of ladies in the cabin of the ferry-boat, many of whom were standing, while several men were seated. One of the deck hands of the boat came in, and, seeing that men were occupying seats, said, "come, come, gentlemen, remember that you have all got mamas at home."

This homely appeal had an instant effect, and every man instantly rose from his seat. It is this thought that actuates men in their conduct towards women, or rather should do so for every one has women at home; and how would the roughest of us feel to see his mother, wife, or daughter, standing in a public conveyance while a man was sitting comfortably at his ease? We have all got women at home.

But there is a possibility of a man being better entitled to a seat, on the score of personal weakness, than the lady to whom he resigns it, and every man should be left to settle the matter in his own conscience. The sixpence worth of omnibus, or railroad car, or ferry-boat, for which he has paid, is his own personal property, and he has just as good a right to keep it as he has to keep his gold watch, his walking stick, or his shepard's wand. St. LAURENCE divided his cloak with the beggar, and RALEIGH spread his in the mud for his Royal Mistress to tread upon; and both of these gracious acts have been immortalized. Surely, the man who gives up his seat to a sewing girl, and stands on the step of an omnibus outside in the rain or dust, is as worthy of being immortalized as the Saint or the Knight.

The gallant "Easy Chair" in the December Harper reads Gunnybags a lecture for not always giving up his seat, and thinks he has no right to grunt out "all full!" when an unprotected female wishes to get in. But Gunnybags may have a gouty toe; he may have a cold in his chest, or he may be in a hurry to go home, or to get down to his office, and, as he has paid his sixpence, and had the luck to come first, let him keep his seat if he can compromise the matter with his conscience while he remembers he has "got women at home." Let Gunnybags be protected in his rights, and, if the omnibuses or cars are not sufficient to carry all the passengers without such jamming and cramming, such sitting on strangers' knees, and hanging on by the eyelids outside, let there be more omnibuses added to the route, or more seats to the ferry boat. When Gunnybags builds himself a house in the Fifth-avenue he does not vacate it to accommodate the poor woman in the next street who, he knows, is making shirts at two shillings apiece. But why not give up his house, or his private carriage, as well as his seat in the omnibus, which he has paid for, and has just as good a right to keep?

In England omnibuses are licensed to carry a certain number of passengers, and are liable to a fine if they take more; but here an omnibus is never supposed to be so full but that it can take one more; and here lies the whole difficulty. The only way for passengers to secure their rights is for them to join in with Gunny bags, and shout to the driver "all full!" when there is no more room to sit down, and the driver should be subjected to a penalty if he takes any more.

Burton's Theatre.

A laughable farce in two acts, called "A Trip to Niagara," was played here last night for the first time, and met with a fair success. The interest of the plot turns on the repugnance of Mr. Trimmer, a Catherine-street linen draper, to leave the City even for a trip to Niagara. He imagines all sorts of catastrophes will happen, and cannot divest himself of the idea that Niagara is still an unsettled part of the country. A couple of lovers avail themselves of this frame of mind to compel the unfortunate Mr. Trimmer when there to give his consent to their union. Four of their friends dress up like wild Indians and nearly frighten the poor old gentleman out of his boots. Rather improbable but funny. The weight of the piece falls on Mr. BURTON, who has several opportunities for displaying his drolleries, particularly in a drunken scene (which by the way he elaborates rather too minutely.) To this fact more than any other we attribute the success of the play. Mr. SKONNELL has a good part, but he was a little too "spontaneous" even for the Fast Hackey.

We did not hear the author's name.

Gottschalk's Second Soiree.

The second Piano-forte Soirée of this eminent artist comes off to-morrow, at Dodworth's Saloon. The overflowing attendance at the first soirée, and the intense delight with which a long programme was listened to to the end, indicate agreeable prospects for the future of this great native pianist. Among other pieces, Mr. GOTTSCHALK will perform WEBER's "Concertstuck." All the visitors in our City should avail themselves of this opportunity of hearing Mr. GOTTSCHALK.

Academy of Music.

DONIZETTI's Opera of "Linda di Chamounix" will be repeated to-night, with Madame LA GRANGE and Mlle. D'OMEZ in the principal parts.

Concert.

Miss ANNA SPINOLA, a young lady who made her début as a vocalist some weeks ago, gives her second concert, to-night, in the Hall of the Brooklyn Athenæum. Miss SPINOLA will be assisted by several well known artists.

Excelsior—Churches Aspiring.

Among the religious societies which have lately gone far up town, is that of the Baptist congregation formerly worshipping in Twelfth-street, of which Rev. SYDNEY A. COREY is pastor. Their new edifice on the corner of Fifth-avenue and Thirty-fifth-street will be dedicated in about six weeks. The plan of this building is somewhat unique for a church, being adapted from that of the Madeleine in Paris. There are no side windows, and the light is admitted chiefly from the roof, through three domes of stained glass, thirty feet in diameter at the base. It is thought that by this arrangement an unusually mild and uniform light will be diffused throughout the building. It is also believed that, owing to the unbroken surface of thick walls, the church will be much cooler in Summer, and may be warmed with a far less quantity of heat in Winter. Especial attention has also been paid to acoustics and ventilation. If this main feature of colored dome lighting should prove satisfactory, and especially if it should strike "fashionably religious quid nunes" favorably, we may expect to see it become the rage for the next half-dozen years.

Probably it was good economy after all to make Trinity what it is, as the most and architectural character will insure no one down-town church at least when all others have ascended to more fashionable quarters, and all below Bleecker-street has become a moral "Howling Wilderness."

☞ In a Broadway store, through whose wide windows we see nothing but half a dozen very pretty girls, the sign is up, "Shawls of below cost." We saw a Turk eyeing the goods with watering mouth.

At the monthly meeting of this Association, after the transaction of ordinary business, Mr. [illegible] MOX delivered an address on the "History of the Waldenses." The attendance was very slender, but the oration, which was exceedingly interesting, was heard with much attention.

BUSINESS NOTICES.

GENIN'S HOLIDAY CARD.

The Christmas week, the season of presents and social [illegible], is upon us, and as its fitting accompaniment, GENIN has the pleasure of announcing his

HOLIDAY HAT

for 1853, the most fascinating and elegant dress CHAPEAU that has been placed on an American head, or carried in the hand of a gentleman. Issued on Christmas Eve, and on the first of January, it is the fashion of the present season, elegant, symmetrically, and finished with the utmost taste, it is a brilliant example of how far the power of art may be introduced in the fabrication of the commonest articles of costume. As a TRAVELING HAT, it stands unrivaled in lightness, coolness and unusual elegance. The display of

is also particularly select and attractive, comprising Sable, Royal Ermine, Marten, Mink, Chinchilla, &c., made up as Talmas, Muffs, Cloaks, Victorines, Gloves and Gauntlets in the newest French mode. Mink sets from $25 to $100 each. The sets at $100 are probably the most beautiful as well as the cheapest article of fur ever exhibited for sale in this country. The attention of the public is also invited to GENIN'S immense assortment of

SOFT HATS,

We have Galveston dates to the 15th instant. The people of Houston have in circulation a petition for the Legislature to grant to the City Council of Houston permission to levy a tax not exceeding one per cent, on the property of the city for the purpose of building the Top Road to connect the Houston and Texas Central Railroad.

The cars on the Harrisburg Railroad now run to within two miles of Brazoria. The Houston Telegraph states that the train of the Harrisburg road proceeded on Friday last, twenty-five passengers and seven freight cars, loaded with cotton, molasses, wool, &c.

The Galveston Bulletin says that myriads of grasshoppers have recently appeared in that vicinity. They have commenced their work of destruction on the garden and vegetation generally, and seem determined to take every thing in sight. The grass, as we stated a few days ago, is all gone, and the cattle which had yet remained are fast being driven down by them. The cattle will soon be driven down to the city for the last time, and by next Spring we will have fresh grounds of alarm.

Last week, opposite the San Antonio House of the 6th, a gentleman and two ladies were robbed from Captain McCulloch's ranch of their horses and other chattels they were in quest of, by Indians. Another person had already lost all his horses but one, and believing that his chance was good for stock enough, he had his stabled directly under the window, so he could hear any noise that might arise from the house. Above the hitching-head had reclined, one night still remained near the window, with an eye occasionally upon the horse; there were also two large dogs stationed at each corner of the house. While thus guarded the horses were taken away without being discovered.

Gomez, the Apache chief, who, writing from El Paso, and speaking of the recent robberies committed by the aborigines "Jack Gibson" and his band, says that the citizens and soldiers who went in pursuit of the robbers returned without having found any trace of them. "Gomez" has served several years on an Apache chief, and for the last four years has been a regular highway robber. Mazemmer, who is one of the band, and who left the impudent note in one of the places they robbed, is said to have been at one time a clerk in Major Hunter's office, and he himself stated that he was clerk for a quartermaster during the Mexican war. Some of the citizens of El Paso offered a reward of $1,000 for the arrest of the party.

The city of Houston is yet without an organized fire company.

The Methodist Conference was still in session at Galveston.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—The case of Spencer vs. The Bank of Baltimore, was concluded yesterday in favor of the Bank, under the instructions of the Court. This decides the question, unless the verdict be reversed by the Court of Appeals, that a note drawn to order, dated in the city of Baltimore, and indorsed by a resident of Baltimore, and made negotiable at a bank in the city of Baltimore, that the payment of said note is properly demandable at the counter of the bank where made "negotiable," though the drawer may reside out of the city, and the place of his residence known to the bank; that the word "negotiable," in commercial sense, is synonymous with "payable," and that a bank may retain cash at deposite at a bank by an indorser on such note, a sum sufficient to cover the amount of the note, interest, and costs of protest.—Baltimore Sun, 24th.

RE-ARREST OF KING, THE ALLEGED EXPRESS ROBBER.—On Saturday, OLIVER KING, whose previous arrest and discharge on bail has been noticed, was again brought before the Police Court on a complaint alleging that said King committed the robbery of $60,000 from the American Express Company in Buffalo, N.Y. E. P. Barton, Esq., appeared as counsel for King, and denounced the second arrest of King for the same offence, as an act of oppression, and appealed to the Court for his discharge. Judge Osborne replied that the complaint made on which King was brought before him, was issued in proper form, and he could not do otherwise than hold the prisoner for examination. The bail was then fixed at $20,000, and King was committed to appear on Thursday next, when Messrs. Cary, Ayer and White will appear up for examination.—Boston Times, 24th.

$5 Arrest in Boston, a few days since, left home and an invested at his wife about $400 in bank bills for safe keeping; she placed it in the fireplace where a fire was seldom kindled, thinking that as such a place of hay in the house, the husband or parent in the temporary absence of the wife, and finding a fire in the fireplace; the money was nowhere very cheerly, and the lady had an opportunity to speculate upon the value of her new Fire Proof Safe.

MEMENTO LIFE!
OR, BEFORE AND BEHIND THE CURTAIN.
A SERIES OF NARRATIVES.

In one volume 12mo., with a spirited Illustration. Price $1 25.

To record the singular incidents that occurred around me, and sketch the striking histories which awakened my interest during a professional career of nine years. Out of the many-colored webs of life thus collected, the narratives that compose this volume were woven. Fiction has lent but few embellishing touches. Truth is left to proclaim her own strangeness. Should this work achieve the object contemplated, its readers will receive a more correct impression of some varieties of humanity, for the public amusement than is generally entertained. Between them and the every-day world the curtain of prejudice has fallen in impenetrable folds. From its fatal shadow those alone who climb to the highest pinnacle of fame escape. Yet, among the most lowly of this proscribed band, there are many whose lives bear witness that Heaven plants its flowers and scatters its pearls in unexpected places. Look for them, you who judge readily, before you pronounce that they have no existence there.

ANNA CORA RITCHIE.

RAVENSWOOD, Oct. 17, 1855.

From the Boston Transcript.

The work is a sort of sequel to the autobiography embodying much that could not well be included in that volume, and casting a thin veil of fiction over scenes and characters, the dates and names of which could not be given without wounding the feelings of living persons. We will only remark that every narrative in this volume is not merely founded on fact, but is in many parts literally true. The denouement and the leading incidents are true, without an exception, and the principal characters will be recognized by many who have known the originals. The work is destined to a popularity equal if not superior to that of the Autobiography; for it is not a mandlin romance spun from a morbid brain, like the many of the feminine novels of the day, but is the result of the life, studies, and experiences of a true woman and an accomplished writer, who has here deposited some of her most sacred convictions in regard to life and its meaning.

From the Boston Atlas.

"The Prompter's Daughter" is one of the three narratives, all beautifully conceived and exquisitely written, in a volume, the scene but fanciful title of which is "Mimic Life, or Before and Behind the Curtain." "Stella" and "The Unknown Tragedian" are the others, and all are sketches connected with the artist life of the stage. If there were no merits at all save the exquisite beauties in the rest of the volume, the tender, touching narrative of Tina Truebeart, the good Prompter's little daughter, would alone fill the volume with its pervading odor of sweetness and the impress of beauty.

We advise all who would enjoy a rare treat, the most exquisitely beautiful production of the author (never finished yet, to buy the volume, (if they cannot borrow one,) and be sure to read the story of little Tina—a story destined to rank among the most beautiful sketches of childhood that have ever yet appeared.

Peter Parley "still lives." J. C. Derby has issued two new volumes by Peter Parley, the ever moral, instructive and entertaining. They are destined to make many bright little eyes twinkle, and many rosy little mouths water. Any boy or girl, from ten to fifteen, would dote upon them, and we are not sure that children of a larger growth would not gather information and entertainment from their pages.

From the New-York Tribune.

Every child in the United States who has any taste for good books will brighten up the moment of the recovery of Peter Parley. Two new volumes from his charmingly garrulous pen will be as welcome as the Thanksgiving roast turkey. Besides the delightful talk which Peter Parley gives you in these books, they are full of fine engravings which almost make you feel as if you had seen the curiosities he tells about.

From the Hartford Daily Courant.

We see no other way for parents to do than to buy both, and give one of them to the son, and one to the daughter. The price is $1 each, or in full gilt sides and edges, $1 50.

A new edition of that most beautiful and entirely original
ENTERTAINMENT FOR CHILDREN,
FANNY GRAY.

A History of her Life, in a series of six beautiful Figures, from new and exquisite designs, printed in oil colors, in the best style of the art. With poetical descriptions.

From the Traveler Gazette.

Messrs. Crosby, Nichols & Co., Boston, have published a series of beautiful designs, painted in oil colors, with an accompanying story in verse entitled "Fanny Gray," which gives the history of her life, which the exquisite figures are designed to illustrate. Little Fanny is represented in six different characters; once she was a cottage girl, and had a happy home, which looks very attractive in the picture; then fortune frowned, and she became a wanderer and sold matches, till kind-hearted "Farmer Weston" took her home, where she fed his chickens and gathered the wild flowers from hill and moor. All is happy in the character of Fanny, discovered by her rich uncle, who makes her his pet and a little lady; all of which may be tastefully shown by figures as the story proceeds. The whole is one of the neatest and most delightful gifts for children that we have ever seen.

PRIVATE CORRESPONDENCE OF HENRY CLAY.
FOR SUBSCRIBERS ONLY,

In 1 vol., 843 pages octavo, embracing the "Letters and Private Correspondence" of the great American Statesman. Edited by CALVIN COLTON, LL. D., author of "Life and Times of Henry Clay."

Except about half a dozen, none of the six hundred letters of this volume were ever before published. This volume is an Epitome of Epistolary History, (political, public and private,) given by the parties in correspondence in all the freedom of private communication.

The work is printed on fine white paper, and embellished with a view of Ashland, from a steel-plate engraving; also, a fac-simile letter; and furnished to subscribers, in muslin binding, at $3 50 per copy.

From the Baltimore American.

Everything from the pen of Mr. Clay is received with avidity by the public, no matter how unimportant the subject it treats of. No man, with the exception of Washington, ever made so deep an impression on the general mind of America. He was loved to idolatry, or he was hated to desperation. If anything could add to the interest with which the title of the work is sure to invest it, it might be found in the long period over which this correspondence extends—in the important events with which it is crowded—in the familiarity of the writer with a great number of them, and with the world-wide reputation of many with whom he corresponded.

From the New-York Tribune.

After the unwearied devotion of years to his laborious task, the editor of this volume has now given to the world a copious selection from Mr. Clay's private correspondence. It embraces the most important letters among some three thousand manuscripts. The correspondence touches upon the leading events in Mr. Clay's political career, and presents many valuable illustrations of the history of the times. It is not, however, confined to topics of a public character. Several curious offerings of advice or sympathy are also given in the form of anonymous letters. Mr. Colton is entitled to great credit for the industry which he has shown in making the selection, which will furnish the future historian with important materials.

The work is now ready for delivery. It is not for sale in Bookstores. Agents are wanted to canvass every county in the State. Apply to C. T. ZIEGLER,
No. 13 Gilsey Building.

Scientific Movements at Albany.

[illegible] Medical Department, known as the Albany Medical College, has been established and distinguished for years. The distinguished talent displayed in the LAW SCHOOL of the University attracted the large number of students—also since death stilled the voice just closed. The Observatory, at Hill, from Mr. DUDLEY, its principal patron, [illegible] Observatory, is already built. The Observatory is a chaste and elegant structure, [illegible] elevation in the neighborhood of the City. It commands a noble view of [illegible] the distant mains, the antique heavens [illegible] Albany, and (to quote again from Gray on Rural College)

"The expanded heaven
Of grace, of hope, of mood."

[illegible] either way of the Hudson River, and the high mountain ranges on every hand in the distance. [illegible]

Prof. GERMAN, of the United States Coast Survey, is now in Europe, commissioned to contract for the finest set of Astronomical apparatus which modern science and modern mechanism are capable of producing. It is the intention of the founders and patrons of the Dudley Observatory, that it shall be the best equipped Institution of the kind in the world. The Hellenicon, which is a masterpiece and a marvel of Astronomical art, and of which there are but three in the world, will combine still more adaptitude and improvements, and complete everything of its kind in perfection and power. The Meridian Circle, Prof GOULD feels assured, "will be a triumph of mechanical art, classic and ever noticeable in the history of Astronomy." The Circle, the Transit Instrument and Astronomical Clock, presented by Mr. CORNING, will be in their place in the Observatory by said summer, 1856.

As the representative of these noble enterprises in Albany, Dr. GOULD has received the warmest greetings from the most celebrated astronomers and mathematicians of Europe, Mr. RAMAGE, Mr. [illegible], Director of the Radcliffe Observatory at Oxford, Prof. Encke of Berlin, the famous Arago-LANDRE, (after ARAGO, the greatest of living observers,) enter into these movements with enthusiasm, and express themselves delighted that such brilliant preparations are in progress for scientific research in America. The illustrious VON HUMBOLDT has written a letter in the same spirit. Le Verrier gave Prof. GOULD a dinner party, at which all the astronomers of Paris were present, and many of the scientific celebrities from other parts of Europe, whom the Exposition had brought to France. These great and enlightened spirits, which wield and hearts are honored by no boundaries but those of the republic of letters, listened to the statement of these projects with delight, admiration, and wonder. With one voice they say: "Take the youth, his means, has energy, and a noble ambition." Europe has looked to America to do much for Science. What we hear to-day assures us that she is now entering upon a career worthy of her own greatness.

These things redound greatly to the honor of the ancient capital of the Empire State, and will be hailed with feelings of common congratulation and pride by every educated mind in the American Union. The American Association for the Advancement of Science have given emphatic evidence of their appreciation, by appointing their Annual Session (for the second time within four years) to be held in Albany in August next. At that time, in the presence of a galaxy of learned and eminent men, the Dudley Observatory, with its splendid treasury of astronomical mechanism will be dedicated with suitable ceremonies to the [illegible] of COPERNICUS, GALILEO, and NEWTON. Many distinguished persons have been invited to join in this inauguration, and LEZEAU, of Germany, and AIRY, Astronomer Royal of Great Britain, have already signified their determination to attend. Hon. EDWARD EVERETT will pronounce the Discourse. The State Geological Hall, now in course of erection, will be formally dedicated at the same time. Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, under whose administration as Governor this survey commenced, and who wrote the introduction to the Natural History of the State, will deliver the Oration. Beyond all question, the session of 1856, at Albany, will be the most interesting and memorable which the American Association for the Advancement of Science has ever held; and every [illegible] will share in the belief that the time and place will mark the beginning of a long and brilliant course of triumphs in the sublime walks of human research.

A SPECULATIVE HUMAN BEING.—We have in this village one of the most singular human beings (all things considered) to be found in this corner of the world. He is a dwarf, about 70 years of age, quite small and deformed, and, not exactly an opium-eater, but addicted to the use of that drug. He has been a victim of the habit for years, and all attempts to prevent his indulgence in the stupifying drug have been in vain. The desire for more and more has steadily gained on him, until at the present time he nearly drinks two ounces of laudanum every day, and, what is still more remarkable, eat at one meal! This enormous potation is swallowed at a regular hour in the afternoon of each day; a pipe and tobacco then follow, and smoking is in order till midnight, unless circumstances of the subject is somewhat unusual, when he is helped to bed. The only object for which this strange creature seems to live, is this deadly narcotic, and his only earnest ambition is centered in procuring the little it has left found impossible to place any adequate barrier between the drug and the drugged, the attempt has been abandoned, and it has been thought best to remove temptation as obstacles in the way of due reformation. In accordance with this determination we understand that the victim—whose pallor and haggard visage gives fearful evidence of the operation of the coiled serpent, which alternately writhes and slumbers in his bosom—has made a contract for the daily supply, at reduced prices, with every of our drug stores, from whence he draws the [illegible] death, which infatuate have been [illegible] followed by the rattlings of hell, with the most punctilious punctuality.—[illegible] Advertiser.

AN AFFECTING STORY.—A CHILD LOST.—The Morgantown Union gives the following interesting account of the loss of a child of Prudence Grant, in Preston County, Va.:

A little child of three years of age, attempted to follow its father to a neighboring church distant [illegible] miles; missing the child, he returned and at once instituted search. She followed her husband, but heard no tidings of the lost one. Father and mother, spreading the alarm, joined by sympathizing neighbors, set out on a search, and all that day and night they continued the search, but nowhere was found, and with the little wanderer was not found. Court was in session at Kingwood, (the County Seat,) and on Saturday morning adjourned to allow all attendance to aid in restoring the child to the anxious parents. The party, numbering now about two hundred persons, searched the woods all day, but still the lost had been well night absent, and, what is still more remarkable, all at one time! This enormous potation is swallowed at a regular hour in the afternoon of each day; a pipe and tobacco then follow, and smoking is in order till midnight, unless circumstances of the subject is somewhat unusual, when he is helped to bed. [illegible] Advertiser.

[illegible] Harvard Divinity School.—The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has decided adversely to the prayer of Harvard College, vs. the Society for promoting Theological Education. The case was the petition of the President and Fellows of Harvard College to transfer the funds in their hands for the support of the Divinity School of Harvard College into the hands of a new board independent of the College. The Court decided that it would be ultra vires in the Corporation to undertake to withdraw the charter of which obedience by Students from [illegible] hitherto in all but two instances, were given, either in express terms or by [illegible] Harvard College, and [illegible] the Trustees of Phillips Academy, Andover, [illegible] Phillips Exeter, [illegible] Yale, Dartmouth, Williams, Amherst, Bowdoin, Brown, Middlebury, Norwich, Hobart, Trinity, Kenyon, Jefferson, Washington, Hamilton, Union, Geneva, Rutgers, Hamilton, Dickinson, Lafayette, Lehigh, Franklin and Marshall, Pennsylvania, Dickinson, Washington and Jefferson, Allegheny, Wabash, Marietta, Western Reserve, Ohio Wesleyan, Kenyon, Oberlin, Ripon, Beloit, Michigan, Iowa, Chicago, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Hillsdale, Madison, Lawrence

LONG-ISLAND.

Brooklyn City Railroad.

According to a report of the City Clerk, the total number of cars licensed to run on the different branches of the Brooklyn City Railroad is 74, distributed as follows: On the Green Point route, 16; on the Myrtle-avenue route, 16; on the Greenwood route, 22; on the Fulton-avenue route, 12. There are also six unlicensed cars on the Hamilton-avenue route. The total amount paid by the Company for licenses in 1855 is $1,290. In 1854 the amount paid was $1,220.

Brooklyn Justices Again.

At a meeting of the Brooklyn Common Council on Monday evening, a communication was received from the Comptroller stating that all the Justices of Peace in the Western District, with the exception of HENRY O. CURTIS, have made regular returns of the fees and fines received by them since 1st January, 1855,—that no returns have been received from those in the Eastern District,—and that, excepting Messrs. BENNETT, (First Ward,) BARNKIN, FOWLER, GOELET, BUTLEY and WALSH, none of the Aldermen had complied with the resolution of 15th October, requiring them to make the returns.

On this communication, quite an exciting debate arose, during the course of which he said he could prove that some of the members of the Board had received large sums on account of fines and fees. Several members rose and exculpated themselves from the charge, while others were commonly silent; and it was finally agreed, by unanimous consent, (some of those hinted at probably daring to object,) that the matter should be referred to the Corporation Counselor, with directions to prosecute the defaulting Justices and Aldermen.

Williamsburg Defaulters.

In the Brooklyn Common Council on Monday evening, a report from the Comptroller was read recommending the payment of a sum of $662 to HENRY CORNWELL, an ex-officeholder of the late City of Williamsburg. It appears, however, that CORNWELL is alleged to be a defaulter to the amount of $7di, and that in July last, the Board passed a resolution directing the Comptroller to institute criminal proceedings against him. This the Comptroller has not done, and Aldermen FOWLER and HUNTER, at a meeting held Monday evening, charged it to be a most shameful neglect of duty on the part of the Comptroller. The Comptroller, in reply, said he was not responsible for the action of his predecessor. He had caused a warrant to be issued against Cornwell, but he was not to be found. The matter was referred to the Corporation Counsel, with a request that he should take the proper steps to secure the arrest of Cornwell.

NEW-YORK CITY.

Counterfeiting at the Tabernacle.

A novel entertainment was produced at the Broadway Tabernacle last night. It was an illustrated exposition of the iniquities of counterfeiting, with plates, (literally.) There was a copper-plate press, and there were dies, and impressions of the plates were taken and exhibited. A panorama, elegantly painted, and very much above the average of such affairs, set forth the different styles of counterfeits of bank notes; and an examination of that induced a very speedy overhauling of portemonnaies. A genuine and altered five on the Ocean Bank of this City, a spurious five on the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Hartford, and "plugged" plates, were exhibited. The stories that Mr. DYE told of counterfeiters were pretty good, but not half so entertaining as his statement that no Counterfeit Bank Detector is worth a rush to detect bad bills—but that such little conveniences were established in the first place to help counterfeiters in getting rid of their work. There was a slim audience, even counting the orchestra, (nine persons,) and the main point seemed to be to find market for certain dies.

A New Line of Ocean Steamers.

The steamer Genesee has been purchased by the house of S. DE AGRELA, JOYS & Co., of this City, to run between this port and Puerto Cabello, Venezuela. She is to be the pioneer of a regular line, and is intended to touch at St. Thomas, Porto Rico and Laguayra. She is 1,300 tons, one year old, and has the very best of accommodations for passengers. She is to be commanded by Capt. JOHNSON, an experienced sailor, and perfectly familiar with the route. This enterprise, we hope, will be successful, as it will furnish greater facility for intercourse between us and our rapidly rising sister, the Republic of Venezuela. The Partnership has been offered to Pulser CANNING, formerly of the Baltic, and favorably known.

The Russ Pavement.

To the Editor of the New-York Daily Times:

There seemed much discussion in the several papers of this City, on the subject of grooving the pavement of Broadway. The Committee appointed to investigate the subject seemed to have settled on the plan of grooving as presented in Broadway near Murray-street.

From a thorough investigation of the subject, I am of opinion that grooves of that form will, in little time, be of no especial benefit. The angle at which they are formed is so obtuse that a little wear will render them ineffectual.

My opinion is, that the groove should be in the form of a U; the sides being vertical, no way from wheels or horse shoes could reach them, and the groove would continue to be effectual until nearly obliterated.

The slight curve at the bottom of the U would give sufficient strength to the stone to resist concussion.

A groove of this form need not be more than 1¼ inches wide, as the slight wear of the corners will keep it of sufficient width.

As the concussion of the wheel is in proportion to the width of the groove, the narrow groove will preserve its form much longer than the wide. From a series of experiments in cutting stone with machinery I am satisfied this form of groove can be cut as cheaply as the specimen on Broadway can be cut by hand. YANKEE.

Steamboat Sunk.

We hear that the well-known East River steamboat Glen Cove ran against a rock, near Pillicock Buoy, about ten miles below Glen Cove, and sunk. Crew and passengers saved.

☞ We call attention to the Fair now being held in the Hall, No. 312 Broadway, opposite the City Hospital, for the benefit of the Colored Orphan Asylum. This is a worthy object, and we hope the ladies, who have got up the Fair by much effort, will be well patronized.

☞ One of our religious papers remarks that Philanthropy is supposed to pay well at all times and instances:

HENRY GRINNELL, who fitted out the several Arctic expeditions from this country in quest of Sir JOHN FRANKLIN, expended in these enterprises about ten thousand dollars, the Government assuming the rest of the expense. The house of which he is a member, GRINNELL, MINTURN & Co., will clear three-quarters of a million of dollars upon orders from the British Government for grain—orders sent to that house by reason of Mr. GRINNELL's connection with it.

Wounded in Fire.

A deranged man, named GEORGE H. YOUNG, attempted to commit suicide Monday morning, by cutting his throat with a knife. He was found lying on the sidewalk in Fifty-fourth-street, and was conveyed to the Twenty-second Ward Station-house, where he was attended by the District Physician. It is thought that he will recover.

Accidents.

A man named WM. FATHAM was brought to the City Hospital yesterday, suffering from a badly fractured thigh, received by being crushed between two cars which he was coupling on the Erie Railroad at Piermont.

EDWARD GERRIS, a workman, fell from the building No. 164 Bayard-street, and fractured his thigh. He is under treatment at the New-York Hospital.

UNITED STATES MARSHAL'S OFFICE.

ATTEMPT AGAINST THE STRONG OF THE SHIP GRAY.

On Friday afternoon officer Holmes went on board the bark Robert Robertson, from Liverpool, and arrested two American sailors, who had shipped on board in order to return to New-York. The names of the prisoners are WM. WILSON and JOHN HANSON, and they stand charged with the murder of Andrew Blake and William Bollard, while on board the American ship Sarah, on her last voyage from New-Orleans to Liverpool. The deceased died in the Liverpool Workhouse. The prisoners were taken before Commissioner BETHUNE, and committed for trial.
